Sterns honoured for 20 years of service to shul

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A congregational rabbi must not only lead his synagogue in strengthening the covenant that was established between God and the patriarchs, but must also be an integral part of the world around him, said Rabbi Hersh Galinsky.

That is the achievement of Rabbi Moshe Stern, Rabbi Galinsky told a crowd of over 300 at a dinner honouring Rabbi Stern and his wife Sarah on their 20th anniversary at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

The event was held at the synagogue.

Rabbi Galinsky, director-general of the Rabbinical Council of America Educational Institutions in Israel, which includes Yeshiva Hadorom and Gan Yavne Youth Village, called that covenant "the basis of Jewish survival."

Many acts of chesed cited

However, it is the addition of the eternal link with the Land of Israel that makes the covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob complete, the rabbi said.

The Sterns have followed their example, Rabbi Galinsky said, citing their many acts of chesed, their encouragement of learning, and their strong support of Israel.

The Sterns' son, Yitzie, praised his parents for their private acts of kindness, such as his mother baking and distributing numerous loaves of challah on Shabbat and holidays, and arranging surreptitiously to give financial help to shul members in need.

Past president Murray Frieberg called Rabbi Stern "a hands-on rabbi." Both the rabbi and his wife, Sarah, are "one of us. They are not in an ivory tower. They rejoice with us and mourn with us."

An emotional Rabbi Stern said that when a rabbi accepts a position, "you have to have mazal. And this really is a shidduch."

He took the opportunity to plead with those present to visit Israel, in spite of the tense situation there. "They need our presence."

Bella Rolnick, sisterhood president, praised Sarah Stern for "making the people she is with, feel important. She visits the sick, counsels young girls, [she is a teacher at Beth Jacob High School] and opens her home to guests."

The Sterns were presented with a hand-made challah cover that can also be a wall hanging, and round trip tickets to Israel.

Veteran journalist retires from CJN

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Ben Rose submitted an article about a race horse to the Ottawa Journal, it sparked a journalism career that has lasted almost 60 years.

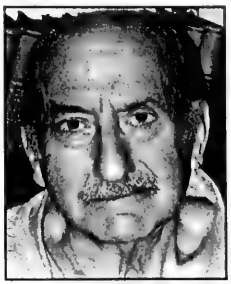
Throughout his career, Rose, 79, has written for the Ottawa Journal, the Toronto Star and The Canadian Jewish News.

He has also been public information officer for the Toronto Board of Education and a professor of journalism at Sheridan College. He is retiring this month after a 20-year stint at The CJN.

Rose, who says reporting "is in his blood," recalls that one of the highlights of his career was receiving a Sloan and Rockefeller Foundation fellowship in science writing at Columbia University in 1961. "I packed up my wife and three children, and we lived in New York for the year. I learned a lot."

While at the Star he was a reporter, an editorial writer and a feature writer for Star Weekly. "Being a reporter is the greatest craft," says Rose, who still plans on doing some freelance writing.

"No other profession gives people the opportunity to learn so much and meet so many people. How else would I have met John Diefenbaker, Lester Pearson and Pierre Trudeau?"



Ben Rose

He hesitates to list people he has interviewed, "because if I mentioned names, I would inevitably leave people out."

Mordechai Ben-Dat, editor of The CJN, called Rose "a deep reservoir of tremendous journalistic and life experience.

"I have had frequent occasion to dip into that reservoir for guidance, advice and counsel. It was a privilege to work with Ben; the paper and the readers benefited from having him on staff."

Jeff Rosen, news and Internet editor at The CJN and a student of Rose when he studied journalism at Sheridan College, says Rose interviewed him when he applied to the school. "I was nervous, but from the moment I met him, his easygoing manner put me at ease.

"He was a tough teacher, however. He expected a lot from his students."

Rosen credits Rose for suggesting he submit freelance articles to The CJN while he was still a student. "He got me my start here. I'll always remember that."

It was when Rose retired from Sheridan, that he began working at The CJN. "It meant I could be a reporter again, and I was glad to be doing it; I really would not want to do anything else."

He "gravitated to The CJN, because at the time it was the only Jewish paper in Toronto," he says.

"I wanted to be involved with the Jewish community, and write about Jewish issues and events. It was the perfect place to be," said Rose, who covered, among other beats, seniors, Canadian Jewish Congress, Yiddish, hospitals, and small Jewish communities.

He has worked for three editors at The CJN – the late Maurice Lucow, as well as Patricia Rucker and Ben-Dat – and has watched the "positive changes over the years. I've enjoyed being here, and I intend to keep on writing. Reporting is something you can do until the end. I'm 79, however, and it's time to retire from the office."

He wants more time to look after his wife Fanny (Kriger) who has been diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease, and more time to visit with his children – Ruth and Paul, who are teachers, and Henry, a computer specialist – and his seven grandchildren.

Israeli navy's importance may grow: attache

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's navy, the smallest component of the Israel Defence Force, may morph into its most important strategic arm, says the Israeli naval attache in the United States, Captain Eliyahu Glickman.

The importance of Israel's naval forces could well grow by quantum leaps as Israel relinquishes more territory to the Arabs and as hostile countries in the region, such as Iran, develop long-range ballistic rockets capable of hitting any point in Israel, the former commanding officer of Israel's navy seals commandos said in an interview last week.

Glickman was in town to give a talk at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on the current situation in Israel.

Posted to the Israeli Embassy in Washington, Glickman said that the navy has increased its firepower and range with the acquisition of top-of-the-line weapon systems – three American-built Saar-5 missile boats and three German-manufactured Dolphin submarines.

The Saar carries Harpoon missiles and a single Panther helicopter, as well as advanced command-and-control equipment, and can remain at sea for longer periods of time, Glickman said.

The diesel-powered Dolphin, twice the size of the aging subs in Israel's submarine fleet, bristles with Harpoon missiles and state-of-the-art electronic warfare equipment, and is ideally suited for intelligence missions.

According to reports published in the Israeli press, the Dolphins can be fitted with nuclear warheads and could be deployed to retaliate against Iran or Iraq, both of which are reportedly trying to acquire nuclear weapons.

Asked about this possibility, Glickman replied, "They [the Dolphin submarines] don't carry nuclear warheads at this time."

Glickman, however, suggested that the Israeli navy can reach countries like Iran, Iraq and Libya, all of which have called for Israel's destruction.

The role of Israel's navy, which has a contingent of less than 10,000 sailors, is basically two-fold: to defend the coastline from terrorist infiltration and to keep the sea lanes open to merchant marine traffic.

Glickman, 39, pointed out that 95 percent of Israel's imports arrive via the Mediterranean Sea and the Red Sea.

He said that Egypt, no longer at war with Israel since the 1979 peace treaty, has the largest navy in the Middle East.

In recent years, Egypt has replaced its Soviet and Chinese vessels with ships from the United States. "I don't know if Egypt's navy is better than ours," he said.

Syria's Soviet-vintage fleet dates back to the 1970s. "They don't have a very sophisticated navy compared to ours," Glickman observed.

Glickman said he didn't have much information about Iran's navy, but noted that it is being modernized.

In his estimation, the Israeli navy will require three more submarines and three additional missile boats within the next decade to keep pace with developments. At current prices, a fully-equipped Saar-5 boat costs about $180 million (US) and a Dolphin submarine around $300 million (US).

The navy's slice of the military budget varies annually from four to five percent. "It should be 15 percent to 20 percent, but this is wishful thinking," he conceded.

Glickman, who joined the navy in 1979 and fought in the 1982 Lebanon War, commanded a missile boat in the late 1980s. He was appointed to his present position in July 1999.

He said the navy has yet to determine why a 12-member Israeli naval commando force was wiped out in a Hezbollah ambush in southern Lebanon in September 1997. "We still don't know why it happened."

Glickman said the navy has not made a decision about raising the Dakar, an Israeli submarine that sank in the Mediterranean in January 1968 with 69 hands aboard.

It would be a very complicated operation costing as much as several hundred million dollars.

Recently, the Dakar's command bridge was hauled from the seabed by an American salvage company hired by the IDF.

Glickman said the navy has not ascertained what caused the tragedy.

New BJCC director fosters sense of community

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sherry Kulman

TORONTO — The Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) truly serves as the centre of the community, says its new executive director.

"For many people, the BJCC is their only affiliation with the Jewish community," says Sherry Kulman, who took over the post in May.

With this in mind, she says, the BJCC offers cultural, educational, Jewish holiday and athletic programs, as well as a daycare and nursery school. "A sense of community is the keystone in [deciding] what we offer.

"This place is like home to a lot of members. They work out, have lunch at the kosher cafeteria and attend a program; they have a real sense of belonging. About 1,000 people a day come through the doors. That is what makes us different from other facilities."

Some groups of people even get together for a Shabbat kiddush, she says. "This is their initiative. They see the BJCC as their own place and they become involved; the place matters to them."

Kulman, originally from St. Thomas, Ont., is a graduate of University of Ottawa with a master's degree in criminology. She spent 10 years as executive director of the John Howard Society in Toronto, an agency that assists individuals in conflict with the law.

Although her duties at the BJCC are the same – ensuring the overall effectiveness and efficiency of the operation – the job is totally different, she says. "I spent time working with people who did not have a community. Then I walked in here, and encountered people who did indeed have one.

"This is what I had tried to give clients at the John Howard Society. They were people who were looking for a sense of belonging – a sense that they mattered to the world. Here there is a community that cares."

While John Howard serves disadvantaged people, "the BJCC's cause is Jewish people," she says. "There are parallels between the two."

Kulman oversees the centre's five departments – Koffler Gallery, Leah Posluns Theatre, culture marketing and fundraising, finance and community programs. She reports to a board of directors of about 25 lay members, all of whom are involved in some level in the organization.

"There are also people involved in the centre's operations; with about 240,000 square feet and 7,500 members including affiliate members, we face a lot of issues."

Kulman is involved "in the big picture – strategic planning, and envisioning where we want to go from here.

"We always strive for excellence in programming, and we want to be the hub of the community. We also want to bring Jewishness into the community in terms of education and programs, to ensure that people can feel connected and have a sense of belonging to the Jewish community."

The centre feels a sense of responsibility to its members, she says, and satisfaction surveys are conducted regularly to determine "where we can go. We have to program in terms of the future.

"In seven years, the Weldrick campus will be built, and we will have positioned ourselves to be the hub of the central campus, with state-of-the-art facilities and programming."

The BJCC is one of 275 members of the North American JCC movement, "so we have something to draw on," Kulam says. "We can determine who does things best, and what their programs look like. We meet to share ideas so we are not alone in what we do. There is a network of directors of like-size JCCs."

Community support is also strong. "The lay people give a lot of time, and are committed to the facility," she says. "That makes the job a lot easier."

In the article "Ketubot are works of art" (CJN Party Planner, Nov. 23, page B10), the phone number for Ketubah by Karny Vorona was left out. The phone number is 416-497-9555.

In the article "Let your DJ entertain you" (Party Planner, Nov. 23, page 44), the phone number for Starr Productions should have been 416-812-1222.

We regret the errors and omission.

Learning to reflect

By ANNA MORGAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Every year, teachers face the challenge of following a set curriculum in a classroom where no two kids are alike.

A new program, the Toronto Jewish Centre for the Advancement of Reflective Education (TJCARE), opened recently to help teachers in day schools understand the different needs of their students.

The centre helps teachers cope with the changing social character of schools, with the understanding that, in this respect, day schools are no different than other schools, says York University Prof. Alex Pomson.

"Teachers [in our program] learn to look at the social and personal dimensions of the children, as well as the academic dimensions," Pomson said.

Furthermore, "they also learn to look at the quality of their own relationship with the kids."

In a series of professional development days that take place over the course of a year, "the teachers actually work with their peers. The professional development is provided by colleagues."

"Through the support of many of the Jewish day schools, the board of Jewish Education, UJA FEDERATION and York University, we've managed to create a resource for, and from, the people who are actually working in the system," Pomson said.

The centre in Toronto has also relied on the work and experience of two Israeli educators from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Ora Zohar and Chava Zohar (not related) both teach at the graduate school of education at the Hebrew University.

Ora is also director of the National Centre for Staff Development in Israel which focuses on reflective practices.

"Reflective practice talks to anyone who wants to be thoughtful, perceptive, introspective and concerned with what they are doing," Ora said in an interview.

"In our program," she said, "we concentrate on the educator's roles."

In the same way that we may learn to parent from our parents, "teachers tend to teach the way they were taught. Very rarely are they encouraged to think about why they are doing things a certain way.

"We want to break down that automatic continuity of doing things. Maybe it is the best way. But let's not do things for that reason alone. Let's not just copycat."

In his book, The Reflective Practitioner, the late Donald A. Schön, a former professor at MIT, writes that the scope of most teachers' attention is largely "determined by the boundaries of the curriculum."

However, he notes, a teacher trained in reflective practice would spend time concentrating on the nature of each student.

In every situation, curriculum-based confusion and misunderstanding would be addressed in a unique way because "different students present different phenomena for understanding and action."

Reflective practice, according to Chava, is not a strategy. It's a way of thinking and it can only be taught as a process, in a workshop where conditions are created that would force you to begin thinking in a different way.

What the program tries to do is help teachers "become reflective human beings" so that they can develop empathy.

Then, teachers can look at a child with different eyes, Ora said, and see themselves as having a profound influence on their students.

Grade 5 teacher Greg Bailes, seen with some of his students, participated in a reflective teaching program last year.

The program also understands that the teachers' time in school is stressful and pressured, Pomson said.

In a classroom situation, "teachers are often too exhausted emotionally and physically to step back and think, 'How could I have done this differently?'"

Reflective teaching encourages teachers to develop techniques that they can then use to engage their students during a lesson.

All types of situations are explored, even the mundane.

For example, teachers are encouraged to ask themselves how often are they are asking kids about things that are interesting for kids. How much time are they providing for kids to respond to their questions?

Teachers learn to pay attention to the bond developed with each student in the classroom so that the kids all feel they are liked.

In many ways, Pomson noted, reflective teaching is a return to the ideas of the '60s.

However, "we also recognize the changing social and emotional needs of kids today and that has created an urgency."

It's important that every classroom be nurturing, supportive, embracing and safe, Chava said. And that's not easy.

"You have to work actively to create a nurturing environment. It is very demanding. It forces teachers to think, 'Before I do anything, I have to look ahead at the consequences of my actions.'"

INTERIM DIRECTOR NEEDED

Model synagogue is congregation of learners, says JTS academic

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The "hot model" for strengthening synagogue life today is a "congregation of learners," according to a speaker at Holy Blossom Temple's recent series on The Synagogue and the 21st Century.

Jack Wertheimer, provost and chief academic officer of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, outlined a number of models during his recent talk on Why the Synagogue Stands Alone and Above, but he emphasized that he was describing options rather than promoting any particular one.

Wertheimer was the second speaker in the three-part Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture series, which began Nov. 13 with Rabbi Lawrence Hoffman of Hebrew Union College and concluded with Cantor Joseph Levine of the Academy for Jewish Religion.

Jack Wertheimer

There is much talk about synagogue renewal today, said Wertheimer. It stems from both harsh criticism of synagogues as "a vast wasteland," and – on a more positive note – a growing realization in North America that synagogues are vital institutions. "As goes the synagogue, so goes the American Jewish community," he said.

A historian by training, Wertheimer noted that North American Jews have "reconceived" the synagogue before. He traced its evolution from a monopolistic institution through a number of incarnations to the "synagogue centre" model that emerged and took hold in the early decades of the 20th century.

The latter model provided places for worship, Jewish education for all ages, recreational activities and social action, he explained.

To sustain themselves, he noted, such synagogues needed a wealthy – and large – membership.

The synagogues began to be criticized as huge and impersonal in the 1960s and '70s, leading to independent chevruta-style fellowships which eventually had an influence on the larger congregations themselves, he explained.

In addition to the "congregation of learners" model, major synagogue renewal efforts have included an emphasis on community (finding ways to connect members with one another, including the establishment of committees to greet new faces) as well as the introduction of singing and, in some cases, dance into the service in all denominations of Judaism.

One of the dangers Wertheimer noted was the potential for "losing sight of the culture of the congregation."

Among his personal concerns is the "low level of expectation Jewish institutions have of their members." Talking about expectations scares people, he said. The examples he cited – questions of whether board members should be expected to attend religious services, and whether parents of young religious school students should be asked to commit to attending family education programs – are often met with "derision."

Among Christian congregations, he noted, the "stricter" ones are more likely to thrive than their more liberal counterparts.

Other issues Wertheimer addressed included the post-bar and bat mitzvah dropout syndrome, and how to teach people to pray with meaning.

A final issue was the extent to which the synagogue strives to be in sync with the dominant culture or to be an alternative. "Do we provide an alternative perspective?" he asked, recalling a Torah reading about prohibitions against tattooing. The modern-day issue was not even discussed at the service he attended.

WWI Jewish veteran Sam Kernerman dies at 101

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sam Kernerman, a Jewish veteran of World War I, died at Sunnybrook Hospital recently. He was 101.

During the war, Kernerman fought with General Edmund Allenby and the Jewish Legion in what was then Palestine. He served in Egypt, and was imprisoned with Ze'ev Jabotinsky. He met David Ben-Gurion and Lawrence of Arabia.

Born in England, he came to Canada at the age of 14 with his brother. They settled in Peterborough and later brought their parents and nine siblings over from Portsmouth.

Kernerman married and moved to Toronto, where he made his living as an electrician. He later established the Canadian Die Casting company.

He and his wife moved to Israel in 1960 and lived there for 15 years before returning to Toronto.

"He was a dreamer, the world's worst businessman, but he was very creative," said his son, Morry. "He loved to invent things, an automatic dishwasher and a washerless faucet, for example."

He was president of the Canadian Rocket Society. In 1947, he designed and produced in his basement a prototype of a rocket intended for a trip to the moon. It was exhibited at the Canadian National Exhibition.

His grandparents, Phillip and Rebecca, were among the founders of McCaul Street Synagogue.

His wife predeceased him in 1990 at the age of 91.

Surviving Kernerman are his sons Morry, David, Lionel (Ari) in Israel, Barry and Cy, and a daughter, Reeshi, in Israel, as well as 17 grandchildren and 28 great-grandchildren.

JVS employees
why we're on strike

JVS (Jewish Vocational Service) employees have now been on strike since Oct. 28. At the heart of this workplace dispute are two key issues:

1) Management's desire to open the agency during Jewish holidays (It has closed for all Jewish Holidays since its inception in 1947.)

2) Poor Salaries. Some departments have professional staff who are being paid up to 50% less than their colleagues in similar agencies.

Behind the Issues:

- Accepted labour standards dictate that the ratio of staff to managers should average 10:1 The JVS ratio is 4:1.
- Miscellaneous expenditures went from $32,602 in 1997 to $139,045 in 2000.
- Salaries in 1997 (including management) totalled $2,857,596. Salaries in 2000 totalled $3,837,276 – an increase of $979,680.
- An Unfair Labour Practice charge has been filed against JVS management with the Ontario Labour Relations Board.
- Since the strike began, management has hired security at a cost of about $3,500 per week

All of the above has been done by a management that claims there is no money!

It's time JVS worked for its employees!

Ezrins to be honoured at Israel Bonds '01 campaign launch

TORONTO — Toronto residents Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin and Hershell Ezrin will be among 26 North Americans honoured at the annual Israel Bonds gala International Prime Minister's Club dinner.

The campaign kick-off will take place on Jan. 14, 2001, at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel in Palm Beach, Fla.

The gala dinner also falls on the 50th anniversary of the Bonds program, which was founded by David Ben-Gurion in 1951.

The Ezrins will be among those presented with the Israel Bonds Salvador Dali Menorah Appreciation Award, which is bestowed on those individuals who have made significant leadership contributions to the economic development of Israel through the purchase of Israel Bonds and through a lifetime of leadership in the Jewish community.

Hershell Ezrin

Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin

Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin is a psychologist and certified management consultant who specializes in personal life planning. She is currently a board member of Jewish Family and Child Services of Toronto and a trustee of the Pearson College of the Pacific United World Colleges.

She has been involved with numerous other community organizations including.

She was a member of the Community Support Services sub-committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Hershell Ezrin, a former Canadian Consul in New York and Los Angeles, is currently chair and CEO of GPC International, a leading international government relations and public affairs consultancy with offices throughout Europe, the United States and Canada.

Among his community involvements, he is vice-chair of the Holy Blossom Temple Foundation, a director of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, and is an honorary treasurer of the Canadian Club of Toronto. He sits on the board of governors of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the University College Committee of the University of Toronto. He is also a member of the Toronto Advisory Board and chairs the national communications committee of State of Israel Bonds.

Avraham Shochat, Israel's minister of finance, will be the guest of honour and keynote speaker.

Helen Thomas, the longtime White House Bureau Chief for UPI, will be the guest speaker.

Other Canadian Jews scheduled to be honoured include Mitchel Garfinkle of Montreal and Thomas and Sasha Weisz of Hamilton.

Concordia students fail to pass anti-Israel resolution

Street, as had been the prior agreement with his office.

"We have as much right to be in our school as anyone else. We are peacefully protesting," Hillel vice-president Maya Haasz told The Canadian Jewish News.

Parent Shaul Petel was among the protesters, saying he feared for his two children's security. "This place is a hotbed of Arab hatred."

A metre-wide corridor was maintained between the demonstrators and students entering the assembly.

On the door of the hall was a poster with the headline "Rocks vs. Rifles" and photo of an assault weapon. The SPHR was handing out copies of an article from The Journal of Historical Review, known for its Holocaust denial, alleging Israel is developing an ethnic bomb to kill Arabs.The assembly, held under tight security, was closed to everyone, including media, except those with valid student cards.

The only exception was Boisvert. He later reported, through university spokesperson Chris Mota, that a vote did take place, which supported an amended resolution.

"The debate was quite civil and both sides spoke their mind," Mota relayed.

"It was agreed that the issue was too large to take to the (CSU) council for ratification, so there could be a full-fledged referendum."

No CSU official could be reached after the assembly by The CJN.

Jewish student Tara Silver, who attended the assembly, said the atmosphere was confused and unruly. At least 95 percent voted for the resolution, and it was decided that the CSU council should further discuss the feasibility of a referendum. A March date was mentioned for the referendum, she said.

"About six or seven people spoke for the 'no' side, most not apparently Jewish, but they were booed and shouted at. The president of the CSU [Rob Green] said he wanted to show those outside (the demonstrators) that there would have be a civil debate, but that wasn't possible with the way people were acting."

Hillel has charged that Jewish students feel threatened by the barrage of anti-Israel propaganda on campus, and that the promotion of this resolution is causing an already tense situation to further deteriorate.

Concordia rector Frederick Lowy issued a statement two weeks earlier that called on all students to maintain civil debate or face consequences.

Vice-rector Jack Lightstone said no complaints have been lodged by any student.

The Students' Society of McGill University, lending its support to Hillel, passed a resolution that it will continue to "promote a position of neutrality regarding the [Middle East] conflict in order to avoid isolating and discriminating against certain communities on campus."

Caplan easily returned in Thornhill

he expressed "regret" that Canada's support for the UN resolution added to the "distress and frustration" felt by the community.

At the height of the campaign, Caplan called supporters of the Alliance "Holocaust deniers, prominent bigots and racists" – continuing conjecture that the Alliance was a haven for those on the far right. This was after it was revealed that Doug Christie, lawyer to several Holocaust-deniers, had fulsomely endorsed Day. Christie was later kicked out of the party.

Day too courted the Jewish vote, with promises of greater support for Israel and tax breaks for parents of children in religious schools. But he repeatedly felt the need to say that his fundamentalist Christian beliefs would never influence his decision-making.

Cotler, who took his own government to task over the UN matter, enjoyed one of the biggest margins of victory in the country: He trounced his nearest rival by 30,000 votes, or over 80 percent of those cast, and won every one of the riding's 186 polls.

In Thornhill, Caplan's plurality over Alliance candidate Robert Goldin was 20,000 votes. Similar margins of victory were seen by incumbents Joe Volpe, Jim Peterson, John Godfrey and Art Eggleton, all of whom have sizeable Jewish constituencies.

Folco, 60, won in Laval-Ouest, home to about 4,000 Jews; and Saada, 53, won in Brossard-La Prairie. Both areas are mainly francophone.

Both first elected in 1997, Folco (née Goldgrav) and Saada have much in common: they are francophone, immigrants, have lived outside the mainstream Montreal Jewish community, and describe themselves as secular, yet were shaped by major events in Jewish history.

They belonged to the same left-wing Zionist youth group, Hatzair, and studied linguistics. They share a desire to reconcile people of different cultures, although neither made their Jewishness an issue in the campaign.

Paris-born Folco, a former Immigration and Refugee Board member, spent World War II in hiding with Christian families. Her father was deported to Auschwitz, but survived. Both her parents were ardent Zionists. The family settled in Toronto in the 1950s.

Saada left his native Tunisia for France in 1958 as child. He volunteered in the Six Day War and spent a year in Israel on a kibbutz.

He came to Montreal in 1969 as a university student and has been a teacher, school administrator, and translator. The father of four has lived on Montreal's South Shore for 31 years.

Despite not making his Jewishness an issue, about 40 of Saada's election signs were spray-painted with graffiti equating the Star of David with a swastika.

In a statement, CJC president Moshe Ronen said Congress is looking forward to working with the new government on issues of importance to the Jewish community.

Medjuck elected president at AJC conference

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Sheva Medjuck, a local university professor was elected president of the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) at its recent biennial conference.

Medjuck, a professor of sociology/anthropology at Mount St. Vincent University, succeeds Victor Goldberg, also of Halifax, who completed a two-year term.

"We have challenges in continuing the role of AJC to enrich the quality of Jewish life in our region," said Medjuck.

"We must encourage growth to our region through immigration, which is an ambitious initiative.

"We must retain the strengths of our organization [through] Camp Kadimah and programming throughout the four Atlantic provinces, and we must develop a network with other small communities in Canada to share ideas and resources," she said.

The conference brought together more than 150 people from New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, for 2½ days of meetings, education sessions, discussion groups, dinners and a gala celebration.

Several national organizations were represented, including Canadian Jewish Congress, Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), United Israel Appeal Federations Canada, Jewish National Fund, CJC Quebec region, and Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario.

A special dedication was held at Pier 21 where representatives of CJC, AJC and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services unveiled a plaque commemorating the arrival of thousands of European Jews in Halifax between 1923 and 1971. The new Canadians then dispersed to all corners of Canada, many remaining in the Maritimes to build a strong Jewish community.

Boris Tsinman, Atlantic representative of JIAS, said, "We are proud to honour those immigrants who sought a better life in Canada, and those at Pier 21 who made it possible."

At a workshop on Holocaust education in Atlantic Canada, Claire Frankel-Salama of St. John's, Nfld., told of her city's annual Yom Hashaoh event.

"Our event attracts more than 300 people. With only 25 Jews in the community, that means we've generated interest in the mainstream community.

"While we commemorate the six million who died, we teach tolerance. We have to continue to teach that if you hate, this is where it leads. If you teach the young people we have a better chance than if we don't."

At a session on the Middle East crisis with Consul General of Israel, Shlomo Avital, and Robert Ritter, executive director of CIC, panelists stressed that peace is inevitable.

"But the conflict will be protracted," said Ritter. "No one knows what will happen next. It has gone from low-grade violence to high intensity, from mob scenes and shootings to terrorist bombs."

Youth programming, community relations, specifically in the current Israeli-Palestinian context, and small communities learning from each other, were other panel topics.

A Shabbat dinner honoured Sheldon Cohen, from Glace Bay and Montreal, who retired last summer after 20 years as director of Camp Kadimah.

At a Sunday brunch, Jim Spatz of Halifax, and Frank Pulver of Toronto, showed an audio-visual presentation of their recent visit to eastern Europe to trace their family backgrounds.

Also at the convention, six Jewish Atlantic Canadians were recognized for their long community service and financial commitment.

Bina Funt of Halifax, received the AJC Foundation Award for a major financial contribution to the region's foundation.

A plaque was unveiled recently at Pier 21 in Halifax, a museum developed in an entry area where more than one million immigrants came to Canada between 1923 and 1971. Many of them were European Jews who were assisted by JIAS and local Halifax Jewish agencies. Participating in the ceremony were Jack Silverstone, national executive vice-president Canadian Jewish Congress; Victor Goldberg, president Atlantic Jewish Council; and Boris Tsinman, Atlantic chair, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

Funt, a Holocaust survivor, has lived in Halifax since the early 1950s.

She lost her parents, nephew and husband during the war but survived the camps with her son. She lived in Sweden and Montreal before moving, with her son and second husband, to Halifax.

Honoured with community service awards were: Janet Holtzman of Saint John, who has been active in Hadassah and the secular community for the last 30 years and AJC community representative for the past 10 years; Peter Herschorn of Halifax; Edith and Garson Lecker of Sydney, N.S.; and Ivan Levine of Fredericton.

Other members of the executive and board include: first vice-president, Mark Rosen; second vice-president Jim Spatz; treasurer Michael Pink; secretary Kathy Zilbert; legal counsel Mark David; immediate past president Victor Goldberg; and regional chair of community relations, Israel Unger.

Elected members at large were: Susan Isaacs-Lubin, Saint John; Barrie Carnat, Moncton; Ivan Levine, Fredericton; Claire Frankel-Salama, St. John's; Michael Zatzman, Renee Gersovitz, David Korn, Darrel Pink and Boris Tsinman, all of Halifax.

Camp Kadimah co-chairs are Mark Rosen and Andrew Wolfson, Halifax; and Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation president is Torontonian Darcie Richler, Dalhousie University. Sheva Medjuck is Canadian Jewish Congress Atlantic region chair.

Technion's Ottawa chapter relaunches meetings

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Technion graduate Avner Schneur was the guest speaker at the Canadian Technion Society's Ottawa Chapter's first meeting in 10 years.

Schneur, CEO and founder of Emptoris Inc. based in Boston, is also married to a graduate of the Technion and has employed many Technion graduates in his businesses in Israel and abroad.

Schneur's lecture, called Israel – From "Milk and Honey" to "Tech and Money," centred around e-commerce and its effects on the business world.

"Israel is one big startup country," Schneur said.

Israel is third in equity listings on NASDAQ following the United States and Canada.

With charts and diagrams, Schneur explained the various types of e-commerce and how they affect the marketplace, using examples from the new field of Internet business.

"A B2B marketplace is an Internet-based business-to-business, a virtual marketplace where corporate buyers and suppliers interact and conduct transactions," Schneur said.

"Three years ago, this concept did not even exist," he said. "Now, every company is involved in e-commerce... we are in the beginning of a significant revolution and people may not realize the impact. This is the biggest thing since the industrial revolution."

The national president of the Canadian Technion Society, Arnie Recht of Montreal, also addressed the group. He described the many significant achievements of the Technion in recent years and invited members to participate in an upcoming trip to Israel to visit the Technion and see for themselves.

The meeting, held at Nepean City Hall, was co-chaired by prominent Ottawa lawyer Paul Bregman and by Leo Laks, CEO of Skypoint Capital, a venture capital company which has invested in Israel.

"We are trying to re-introduce the Technion and its valuable work," said Bregman. "Israel, a country with very few natural resources, has exported its brain power and has become a world leader in high-tech."

An opportunity not to be missed

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

It's been a busy political eight weeks for Canadian Jews. They saw the chance for peace with the Arab world blown apart and the Middle East blown back in time to the agony of intifadah. They saw – perhaps even manipulated – their pet project, Canada-Israel relations, catapulted onto the election agenda and dragged out their squabble with the Liberals long enough to alienate some of Israel's best friends – friends, by the way, who were re-elected, in most cases with larger majorities than before.

So what comes next? Well, the one thing that was missing from the recent election campaign – social policy – provides a useful clue.

The Liberals did not run on a platform of real ideas. Neither did the various opposition parties offer compelling policy packages that would identify them as better alternatives than the government (then or now).

So perhaps the Jewish community has an opportunity to play a non-partisan role in the political process by stimulating debate and focusing attention on the many areas ignored by the politicians.

Based upon the premise that traditional Jewish values have something meaningful to contribute to the public debate, it may be time for organizations like Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith to help shape the approach to these problems that will not disappear despite the concerted efforts of politicians to will them away.

Congress once played an important function in social policy areas like the aged, the homeless and the poor. B'nai Brith was once a national leader in drawing attention to, and finding solutions for, the problems of intolerance, exclusion and race relations.

These may not be the most attractive issues to consider but they do cry out for attention. If we believe – and to avoid utter cynicism we must – that most politicians have a genuine desire to effect positive change for the country, then we must also believe that they would welcome some thoughtful input and direction on these issues.

On a substantive level, the merits of such efforts are self-evident. They represent an attempt to improve the quality of life for all Canadians. But even on a level of pure self-interest, engagement of the political sector in the areas of social policy makes sense. It will provide these organizations an entrée to develop (and repair) relations with the politicians. In light of the last two months, it is an opportunity that should not be missed.

McMaster's Witelson explores uncharted world of the human brain

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – To hear her describe it, the human brain is like an uncharted region of the world.

"The human brain," said neuropsychologist Sandra Witelson, "is the last frontier of human knowledge."

Witelson, having conducted the first anatomical study of Albert Einstein's redoubtable grey matter in 1996, believes that scientists have only begun to probe the human brain.

"An incredible amount is not known about it," explained Witelson, a McMaster University professor in the department of psychology and behavioural neurosciences. "This is an area where so much has yet to be discovered."

As astonishing as it may sound, virtually all our knowledge of the human brain is the result of research acquired only in the past 20 years, added Witelson, a Montrealer and McGill University graduate.

Sandra Witelson

The holder of McMaster's Albert Einstein/Irving Zuker chair in neurosciences, she is in the forefront of expanding the borders of science.

Two decades ago, Witelson and her colleagues established a brain bank at McMaster University, a precious public resource for neuroscientists. As a result, she was invited to examine Einstein's brain.

The repository contains 150 brains extracted from terminally ill people after their deaths. It has enabled Witelson to study the relationship between the physiology of the human brain and a person's cognitive abilities (such as language, intelligence and visuo-spatial perception).

She has also explored the physiological differences in left and right-handed people and written scholarly articles on topics ranging from sex differences in the brain to the biological basis of intelligence.

These studies, having made Witelson famous, prompted Thomas Harvey, an American pathologist who had performed an autopsy on Einstein after his death in 1955, to get in touch with her.

"He contacted me because he knew I had a bank of normal brains," said Witelson. "I guess he thought it would be good to have a control group of brains to compare it with."

Harvey arrived in Hamilton with two jars of Einstein's sliced up brain in the trunk of his car. With the permission of Einstein's family, Harvey had removed his brain for medical research purposes, photographed it, and then cut it up into 200 tissue blocs.

Assisted by Harvey and a McMaster associate, Debra Kigar, Witelson measured, weighed and examined Einstein's brain, holding fragments of it in her hands. They published their findings in the British journal The Lancet in June 1999.

It was an emotionally charged experience which still resonates in her mind.

"After all, the brain is what we are, the essence of an individual. To have come into contact with Einstein's brain, the man who formulated the general Theory of Relativity and changed our notion of the universe, was indescribable."

Although Einstein's brain was quite typical, there was something unique in the anatomy of the Sylvian fissure, which divides the temporal lobe from the parietal lobe.

"In Einstein's brain, the Sylvian fissure runs into another major fold, the so-called post-central sulcus. In fact, it's hard to know where one folds ends and the other begins. It's literally the geography which is unique. It does not occur in any of the other brains in our brain bank."

And in Einstein's brain, the tissue connected to mathematical reasoning was 15 percent wider than in the average brain.

Witelson, the only researcher in Canada who possesses samples of Einstein's brain, argues that a person's functional intelligence stems from biology and environment. "The whole issue of nature versus nurture is outdated. It isn't either or, but obviously both."

She elaborated: "While environmental factors are very important, there is no question but that not everyone can be a Rembrandt or a Mozart, no matter how much effort is put in. Most of us recognize the fact that there are differences among people, but society has difficulty accepting these biological factors."

Having compared men's and women's brains, Witelson thinks that different parts of it do different things in males and females.

"In women, for instance, it looks like the frontal part of the brain is much more involved in the comprehension of language than it is in men."

As for brain differences between people of different sexual orientations, Witelson has found that twice as many lesbians as heterosexuals are left-handed.

Witelson, whose daughter Tamar is a lawyer, was raised in a home brimming with books, including a collection of Einstein's works.

At Strathcona Academy, the Montreal high school she attended, she was a math whiz, but gradually realized that she lacked an intuitive understanding of mathematics.

While at McGill, Witelson studied psychology, a field that led her into biological psychology.

Student journalists explore opportunities at GA

By SIGAL KONIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An opportunity to have lunch with the former Israel Defence Forces spokesperson, Ephraim Lapid, does not come along very often. But when you're lucky enough to be a part of the Do the Write Thing program, opportunities like this are possible.

Do the Write Thing (DTWT) is an annual three-day event held in conjuction with United Jewish Communities' General Assembly. The program brings together students from across North America to participate in workshops pertinent to journalism and the media. As a first-year journalism student at Ryerson Polytechnic University, I was one of 25 students, five of whom were Canadian, who took part in this year's program held in Chicago, Ill.

Against growing concern over the current wave of hostility between Israelis and Palestinians, the issues addressed were objectivity in the press and the dynamics of power between the media and the Jewish establishment, both in Israel and North America.

We heard lectures from Israeli journalists stationed in North America, including Carl Schrag, former editor of the Jerusalem Post, and Nitzan Horowitz, Ha'aretz correspondent in Washington, D.C. Both journalists gave us an in-depth look into their own roles as "mediators" in the Jewish world. Schrag spoke of measures that need to be taken for the recognition of religious pluralism. Horowitz addressed the issue of Palestinian children, claiming that Yasser Arafat has been using the children as a way to attract media attention and world sympathy for the Palestinian cause.

On the second day of DTWT, Ephraim Lapid took centre stage. Lapid is a brigadier-general of the IDF Reserves and the head of the communications and information unit of the Jewish Agency. He discussed media distortion of the current Israeli situation.

After Lapid's session was over, he made his way across the room and sat down across from me. We shared lunch and a discussion. It was one of the highlights of the program for me.

At first, we exchanged a few words on the political situation in Israel. When I told him about my Israeli background and my moving to Canada from Israel at a young age, our conversation turned to my future role as a Jewish journalist. I had no idea at the time that he would soon arrange for me to be on air with him on Kol Yisrael, Israel's primary news radio station.

On the radio show, we discussed DTWT's achievements in the world of Jewish journalism, particularly in the amount of influence on students it continues to have. We also discussed various Canadian newspapers' contentious coverage of Israel.

In addition to giving me the opportunity to meet and work with Lapid, DTWT also gave me the opportunity to submit a short article for an Israeli publication, which will be translated into four different languages.

Do the Write Thing is directed and organized by the Department for Zionist Activities and the University Student Division (Hagshama Department) of the World Zionist Organization, and the Jewish Agency for Israel. Sponsors were the American Jewish Press Association (AJPA) and Hillel.

Hillel rolls on despite turmoil

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Despite the prevailing impression, it hasn't all been "us" (Jewish students) versus "them" (Palestinians) at Hillel Jewish Student Centre campuses in Montreal.

It would be only natural to conclude that this animosity would have become the only issue on the Hillel agenda.

But that hasn't been the case.

Hillel is still a place for Jewish students to go to relax, to socialize, to shmooze, or to take part in a number of Hillel activities at four university and five CEGEP locations.

"According to what I hear from students, the level of general involvement has increased this year," said Simon Bensimon, Hillel's overall director, in an interview that took place just as the latest violence was beginning.

The reason there is more Hillel involvement, Bensimon said, is related to a new thrust to increase the level and variety of programming while entering into something of a new relationship with Hillel's chief funder, FEDERATION CJA.

Bensimon said that in developing "co-operative efforts," ties have never been closer between Hillel and the federation, which allocates $450,000 annually to Hillel.

Bensimon described the relationship as a triangle in which the three corners are Hillel/Centre Hillel, FederatioNext (geared for 18 to 25-year-olds), and the Bronfman Israel Experience Centre that is responsible for student trips to Israel.

Examples of this new dynamic?

Well, not so new is the long-standing collaboration between FederatioNext and Hillel for the Campus Division of Combined Jewish Appeal, which raises about $50,000 annually.

But new does include plans to bring together students – before they graduate – with members of the business community, for a cocktail reception organized in conjunction with Contact ProMontreal.

In addition, the Chaverim program, in co-operation with Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, brings young Russian-speaking college students together at Hillel.

Bensimon said that Hillel is going all out to be creative this year.

Ottawa's support of UN resolution criticized

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada has supported a United Nations resolution that declares Israel's control of all Jerusalem "illegal."

Ottawa's support for last Friday's motion at the UN's General Assembly prompted Opposition Leader Stockwell Day to call this country's Mideast policy "incoherent and inconsistent."

But the government says its position is consistent with Canada's policy that since 1967, eastern Jerusalem has been "occupied territory."

The latest controversy at the world body took place when Canada supported three of six resolutions before the General Assembly. On the question of Jerusalem, Canada voted in favour of a motion stating that the "decision of Israel to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the Holy City was illegal and, therefore, null and void."

The resolution also "deplored" the transfer by some countries of their diplomatic missions, including embassies, to the Israeli capital. Canada's embassy in Israel is in Tel Aviv, as is that of the United States.

Canada was among 145 countries to vote in favour of the resolution. Israel was the only nation to oppose it. The United States abstained, along with four other member states.

The vote on Jerusalem was the most controversial of the six cast last Friday, and is sure to inflame Jewish ire over Canada's voting record at the UN. It came less than two months after Ottawa supported the now-infamous Resolution 1322, which condemned Israel for using excessive force against Palestinian civilians in the ongoing strife.

"We're very distressed about Canada's approach," Rob Ritter, executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee, told The CJN, "and we're going to be very persistent in addressing the issue.

"We plan to take whatever action we need to in terms of dealing with the government further," whether in meetings with the foreign affairs minister or the prime minister himself, Ritter said.

In a statement, Day said Canada "should be brokering a peace settlement in the Middle East, not burning bridges with longtime friends and allies. The prime minister is undermining Canada's long standing reputation as a broker of peace and balance in the region."

Day also came to Israel's defence following Resolution 1322.

Canada voted in favour of two other resolutions and abstained from three. All six motions were updated versions of what have become annual declarations.

One of the resolutions receiving Canada's approval calls on Israel to withdraw from "the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967." It also declares "the need for commitment to the principle of land for peace" and "full support for the ongoing peace process."

Carl Schwenger, spokesperson for the Department of Foreign Affairs, defended Canada's vote on Jerusalem.

He said each resolution is judged on its merits. If it is consistent with Canadian policy, "we support it. When not, we abstain or vote against it," he was quoted as saying.

"Each year we have voted in almost the same way. I don't think our vote has changed significantly on any of the resolutions," Schwenger told Canadian Press.

Ritter said the CIC's objections aren't so much with the thrust of the resolutions as with their language.

"They're loaded with words and statements that are unacceptable. As long as they contain imbalances or inaccuracies, we will object."

For example, the resolution on Jerusalem refers to Israel's control of the city as illegal. Ritter would prefer the words "in dispute."

"There's a big difference between a dispute and something that's illegal," he said.

Last week, The CJN reported that the CIC will hold the government's feet to the fire when it comes to anti-Israel measures at the UN, after it was reported that Canada supported 10 of 12 committee-level resolutions that were opposed by Israel.

The CIC says that normally, those motions, and the ones passed by the General Assembly last Friday, would scarcely merit attention.

But Resolution 1322, and Canada's support for it, "put everything in a new context," said Ritter. "Everything counts now."

IDF revises strategy against PA targets

By AMOS HAREL,
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel is minimizing its use of helicopter gunships against Palestinian Authority targets after concluding that aerial attacks have been largely ineffective, while having a negative impact in the battle for public opinion.

Analysts in the defence establishment say that helicopter attacks were effective only during their first deployment – when firing at targets in Ramallah in retaliation for the lynch of two IDF reservists in mid-October.

Subsequent helicopter attacks, particularly the barrage of over 50 missiles fired on Gaza after the school bus was bombed in Kfar Darom, did not have any real deterrent effect, according to these analysts.

Since this attack in Gaza two weeks ago, the IDF has refrained from deploying these attack helicopters. Even after the bus bombing in Hadera on November 22, Israel did not resume this mode of military retaliation.

A senior defence official explained to Ha'aretz that "from the moment that it became clear that the confrontation would continue for a long time, Israel had to free itself from the pattern of incidents and responses. When the fighting is continuous, it is no longer a question of immediate response to each attack, but rather a continuum of actions over time."

The source noted that this long-term approach would enable Israel to "take advantage of places where there is a relative advantage in order to hit a Palestinian target, even if this is not done immediately after an attack against us."

According to this defence official, Israeli military actions should now focus on "successfully attacking those who attack us."

A number of elite IDF units are now deployed in the territories to target senior activists in Fatah and other Palestinian organizations.

The assessment of the IDF is that the killing of Palestinian gunmen leaders Hussein Abayat in Beit Sahur and Jamal Abdel Razeq near Rafah has proved to be very effective in disrupting the operation of organizations attacking Israel.

On the other hand, Israel is continuing to keep a low military profile in Area A and is not targeting the top leadership of the Palestinian Authority (Mohammed Dahlan, for example) in order to avoid escalating the conflict.

According to Reports

The community is still feeling reverberations from "Endgame in Palestine" (Nov. 18), the Globe and Mail's four-page photo spread by award-winning Magnum photographer Larry Towell.

Well, actually not so much from the photos themselves as from Towell's commentary, as reported by the Globe's Stephanie Nolen. While Towell may be excellent with his camera, when it comes to international law he's more than a little shaky; indeed, he's downright inaccurate, reflecting a widespread misconception that Israel's presence in the territories is "illegal." It's not.

As dovish Israeli statesman Abba Eban observed some years ago, "In November 1967, the [Security] Council adopted Resolution 242 legitimizing Israel's presence in the territories pending a peace agreement."

It also seems to have escaped Towell that Israel has been engaged in a process of complying with the terms of 242, that is, until the Palestinians chose to walk away from Camp David and resort to violence in a direct breach of the resolution.

Towell went to Israel and the territories and photographed both Israelis and Palestinians. But only the Palestinians show up in his photos since he apparently found the Israelis insufficiently human to be depicted. Towell shows no Israeli casualties or suffering; Israeli soldiers remain faceless and callous victimizers.

Apparently mocking the refrain that Israeli soldiers have been forced through self-defence to "shoot and cry," Towell puts it that the soldiers shoot and laugh ("joke amongst each other").

Could Israelis be dehumanized more effectively than Towell has managed to accomplish, at considerable Globe expense (and in the absence of any editorial discretion)?

No, this is not a matter of artistic freedom. It's a matter of journalistic responsibility.

Barak trims his sails on final status

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak last week unveiled proposals for an interim agreement with Palestinians that considerably scales down the Camp David final-status plan.

The American response to Barak's modified peace plan was tepid, and the Palestinian Authority dismissed it outright.

Meeting with the Editors Committee of leading newspapers in Tel Aviv, Barak said the coming elections will not influence the line he will take in talks with the Palestinian Authority. Barak said he will try, as in the past, to reach a settlement that meets Israel's interests.

Trimming the full-fledged final status plans he discussed at the Camp David summit in July, Barak now proposes a "phased final status agreement, or a continuing interim accord."

The new tactic is to address two of the four key issues discussed at Camp David – borders and security arrangements. Barak now thinks negotiations on the other two issues – Jerusalem and the Palestinians' right of return – should be deferred.

American officials are none too enthusiastic about Barak's pared-down proposals. "We would prefer going for a final status deal, but if the two sides want an interim agreement, we will help them," one authoritative American source said yesterday.

Minister Yossi Beilin presented Israel's latest peace plan to U.S. National Security Adviser Sandy Berger in Washington last week. Israel is asking for the Americans to "stand aside" for the time being, so that it can attempt direct, private talks with the Palestinians.

Should these Israel-PA negotiations go well, the United States would be called in to help finalize an accord, and to arrange financial assistance to the sides.

But PA officials yesterday expressed no interest in negotiating along the lines of Barak's interim agreement proposal. Top PA negotiator Dr. Saeb Erekat said the Palestinians categorically reject Barak's proposal to negotiate a final status deal in stages. He said the time has come to discuss the unresolved substantive issues such as Jerusalem and the right of return.

Arafat spokesman Nabil Abu-Rudeineh also said the PA will not discuss any proposal that doesn't address Jerusalem and the right of return.

The main points of Barak's interim plan are as follows:

- Israel will recognize an independent Palestinian state, and will hand over another 10 percent of West Bank territory to ensure territorial contiguity. "B" areas now under joint PA-Israeli control will be put under full Palestinian sovereignty. That would give Palestinians control over 50 percent of the West Bank.
- Western border lines would be demarcated. The plan would allow Israel to annex eight percent of the West Bank and incorporate settlement blocs that abut the Green Line – including areas close to Wadi Ara and Gush Etzion.
- Asked to clarify this section, a source in the Prime Minister's Office declined to say if Israel would evacuate isolated Jewish settlements that break Palestinian territorial contiguity.
- Talks on Jerusalem and the right of return would be deferred for one to five years. A timetable and agenda for future discussions on these will be formulated.
- If no agreement is reached and the Palestinians unilaterally declare a state, Israel will institute countermeasures to promote "separation."

Barak suggested a final status agreement would distinguish between Jewish settlement blocs that will "remain permanently under Israeli control," and "other items that will need hard bargaining and perhaps painful decisions."

Barak declined to elaborate on this latter distinction.

Israel warns Syria it will strike hard

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has stepped up its warnings to Syria and Lebanon following continued Hezbollah activity in the area of Shaba Farms, on the western slopes of Har Dov.

The international Arabic newspaper Al Hayat reported yesterday that the U.S. administration had recently passed on harsh Israeli messages concerning the possibility of an all-out military confrontation in the region.

The newspaper reported that the U.S. ambassador in Damascus, Ryan Crocker, had met over the past few days with a high-ranking official in the Syrian Foreign Ministry and had warned him that a major Israeli military operation could be launched against Syrian forces in Lebanon if the Hezbollah activities were not suspended.

In addition, the Lebanese ambassador to the United States, Farid Aboud, was summoned for talks with U.S. officials, who warned him of a "disaster" if the Hezbollah operations were to continue.

Role and makeup of Supreme Court to be discussed

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Issues relating to the nature, purpose and makeup of the Supreme Court will be discussed during a meeting this Sunday of the Committee for the Selection of Judges.

The date for the deliberations was set by Justice Minister and committee chair Yossi Beilin, and President of the Supreme Court Justice Aharon Barak.

A strong push for the meeting was initiated by Minister of Immigrant Absorption Yuli Tamir, who, as a member of the committee and a government representative, was sharply critical of the composition of the Supreme Court, asserting that it no longer reflected the broad makeup of Israeli society.

In an interview to HaLishka, the journal of the Israel Bar Association, appearing this week, Tamir said that "there is a problem when a whole sector begins to regard the judicial system as something in which it has no confidence.

"In my opinion, the sense of mistrust in the courts stems from a form of skepticism toward the institutions of government in general."

Commenting on her initiative to hold a special session of the committee to discuss the Supreme Court, Tamir said: "I told [Supreme Court] President Barak that over the coming seven years, the makeup of the Supreme Court will be changed, and that we need to plan an ideal outline, which we may not be able to meet, of how the Supreme Court ought to look like in another 10 years."

The week in Israel

Nov. 27

• Twelve year-old Mohammed al-Darrah, who was killed alongside his father during a gun battle in the Gaza Strip two months ago, was likely shot by Palestinian gunmen, not by Israeli soldiers, according to an IDF inquiry. Gen. Yom Tov Samia, said the inquiry's findings were not conclusive due to the refusal of the PA to co-operate in the investigation.

Nov. 28

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak told the Knesset that he is ready to hold new elections. "You want elections. I am ready for elections." (Elections were expected to be in the spring.)

Nov. 29

• The leaders of Shas and the NRP say they would probably back former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu if he decides to run again for prime minister.

• Israel denied allegations by Egyptian prosecutors who claimed they had uncovered an espionage incident involving an Egyptian and a Russian who acted for Israel's benefit.

Nov. 30

• Ma'ariv reported that 60 Knesset members have signed a petition calling for electoral reform that would cancel the direct election of the prime minister.

• Seven Israeli Arabs from the western Galilee were arrested on suspicion of spying for Hezbollah.

Dec. 1

• The Labor Party Central Committee passed a snap resolution backing Ehud Barak for prime minister, but hedged it with a legal ruling that it does not preclude other candidates from putting their names forward.

PA on verge of chaos, top security brass say

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli defence officials warn that the Palestinian Authority appears to be gradually losing control of the situation in the territories.

"The way it looks right now, the situation is fast going toward a state of anarchy" in PA-held areas, a senior defence official said yesterday.

He said that the PA is currently acting as if it is two different countries – the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. He noted that PA leader Yasser Arafat has not visited the West Bank since the beginning of October, apparently out of fear that Israel will not allow him to return to his headquarters.

There are six main security bodies operating in the Gaza Strip and West Bank, headed by chiefs who have competing vested interests. Co-ordination among them is limited.

Israeli officials say that the various Palestinian services probably hide information from Arafat, so that the PA leader does not have a full picture of what is happening in the territories.

The official said Arafat can still stop the violence in the territories, but to do so would mean that the PA security services would pay a high price.

The PA would have to battle Fatah and the Tanzim activists with whom they have until now been aligned in fighting Israel. He added that Arafat has several times ordered a halt to shooting from Beit Jala on Gilo, but he has not been heeded in the field.

Israeli security experts do not discern much willingness or capability among the Palestinian leadership to end the violence. They recommend easing access to the Temple Mount for prayers during Ramadan in the hopes that this will calm the situation. But they add that Palestinian anger over the many fatalities in recent months is likely to fuel violence.

Palestinians push for U.N. force

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Pressure is mounting on Israel to allow the "internationalization" of the Middle East crisis.

Supporters of the Palestinian cause renewed their push this week for the UN Security Council to send a force of 2,000 unarmed military observers to the West Bank and Gaza to "protect" Palestinian civilians.

Mali, representing the council's five Nonaligned Movement members, circulated the draft resolution last week over strong objections from Israel and the United States.

Palestinian diplomats appeared confident they had the backing of at least nine council members, the minimum needed for a formal meeting. No date was set.

The United States, France, Britain, the Netherlands and Canada said they could not vote for a force without Israel's consent. But if the draft comes to a vote, only Washington may use its veto power to kill the measure.

Meanwhile, the UN Economic and Social Council passed a resolution Nov. 22 supporting the creation of a "human rights inquiry commission" to investigate the past two months of Mideast violence.

Jewish observers suspect that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is attempting to internationalize the crisis to both impose – rather than negotiate – a resolution to the Mideast conflict, and to dilute Washington's role as the "honest broker."

Proposing the observer mission is inherently contradictory, Israeli Justice Minister Yossi Beilin suggested, and raises doubts about the Palestinians' true intent.

"Do they really believe that in order to protect the Palestinians, they need an international presence without weapons?" asked Beilin. "For me, it is a big red herring."

The United States has indicated it would likely veto such a proposal if it ever came to a vote because the mission would not have Israel's consent.

Beilin said international efforts should instead focus on getting the Palestinians back to the negotiating table.

"What we really need is a peace treaty," he said.

Meanwhile, the council's resolution follows three other denunciations of Israel by UN organs: by the Security Council, on Oct. 7, by the Geneva-based Commission on Human Rights, on Oct. 19 and by the General Assembly in New York, on Oct. 20.

None of the resolutions has faulted the Palestinian side for any of its actions, while the human rights commission went so far as to accuse Israel of "war crimes" and "crimes against humanity."

Analysts predict that if the historic pattern of UN behaviour toward Israel holds true, the proposed on the ground inquiry would conclude that blame for the current bloodshed rests entirely with the Jewish state.

Israeli Arabs reject the status quo

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

It's increasingly clear that the widespread unrest that convulsed Israeli Arab communities recently – the worst since the formation of the state in 1948 – reflected a resounding rejection of the status quo by Israel's Arab minority of one-million strong.

Mideast Analysis

Taking the form of a general strike, the rioting claimed the lives of 13 Arabs and one Jew, and was accurately described as a "revolt" by Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami.

Blocking roads, erecting barricades, throwing stones, hurling firebombs and attacking government institutions, Arab rioters vented their fury in solidarity with the Palestinian uprising in the territories and in anger at their less than equal status in Israeli society.

As a result of the violence, which flared brightly for about a week and was seen by many Jews as an act of treason, Israel has been forced to reexamine its treatment of its long-suffering Arab citizens, who comprise about 20 percent of the overall population.

Subjected to direct military rule until 1966, Israeli Arabs – the descendants of Palestinians who did not flee during the first Arab-Israeli war – enjoy full equality under the law. In practice, however, they are second-class citizens.

• Their towns and villages receive proportionately fewer budgetary allocations than Jewish municipalities, and thus often lack proper sewage systems or modern schools.

• Their employment opportunities are relatively limited, even in the civil service.

• As they are generally exempt from serving in the armed forces, they do not get the same social benefits as Jews.

• Israel has appropriated much of their land, and Arab access to state land is blocked off.

Due to these grievances, as well as their general unwillingness to identify with Israel or its symbols of statehood, most Israeli Arabs regard themselves as Palestinians rather than Israelis.

Feeling such alienation, a number of Israeli Arab intellectuals have come out in favour of territorial autonomy within Israel. Nevertheless, comparatively few Israeli Arabs have engaged in terrorism or committed treason.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak, who won the support of 95 percent of Israeli Arab voters in the last election, was acutely aware of their problems long before the outbreak of rioting in late September. And in an effort to make amends, he has moved quickly to mend the fabric of relations with Israeli Arabs.

• Barak's cabinet has ratified a $1 billion four-year development plan in 74 Arab localities. By way of acknowledging the injustices of the past, he said: "The supreme obligation of the government is to bring about the equality and the integration of Israeli Arabs."

• On the heels of this initiative, Interior Minister Haim Ramon announced a separate development scheme. "... we cannot continue with the situation that has existed until now," he said. "They do not receive the same resources... as the Jewish sector."

• Barak has established a judicial commission of inquiry charged with examining the circumstances which led to the deaths of 13 Arabs. The commissioners will try to ascertain whether Israeli policemen used excessive force to suppress the disorders, a claim levelled by Arab leaders.

• The Knesset has discussed a bill to guarantee greater Arab representation in government ministries. Of 57,000 civil servants, only 2,818 are Arabs. Of 2,400 senior civil servants, a mere 25 are Arabs.

As these developments unfolded, two of Israel's leading judicial and political figures suggested that Israel cannot afford to return to the status quo ante. The president of the Supreme Court, Aharon Barak, called for complete equality through equitable allocation of resources. The president of Israel, Moshe Katsav, called for the appointment of an Arab to the cabinet.

It therefore appears that Israel is finally rising to the challenge of extending equal rights to Israeli Arabs. Israel, in the interests of morality and stability, has no choice but to do so.

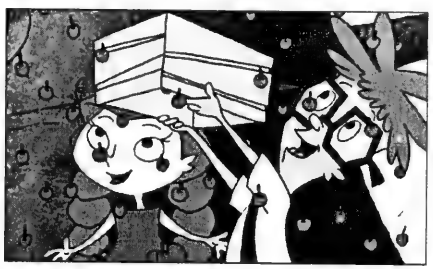
The Tree of Fools, a half-hour animated film

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A mother told her son about the fabled village of Chelm, and the story so intrigued Ira Levy, a Hamilton-born TV producer, that he jumped at the chance to make it into a film.

"It's a Jewish Peanuts told in a borscht-belt version," said Levy, 47.

The Tree of Fools, a half-hour animated film will be shown on YTV at 7.30 p.m. Sunday, Dec. 10. It is the first Canadian-Israeli co-production of Breakthrough Entertainment in Canada and Pitchi Poy in Israel, with half the animation being done in Israel and half at Funboy studios in Ottawa.



Difficulties of language translation have impeded TV production to the extent that The Tree of Fools is the first such co-production in 10 years, although there have been some in the past.

Levy and his partner Peter Williamson were at a TV marketing conference in France when they got the chance to convince Pitchi Poy to be co-producers.

The Tree of Fools, though shaped to appeal to children, will be of interest to parents who know about the wise fools of Chelm and appreciate its Jewish irony, Levy said.

It has been shown on Israel's Channel 2, Tel-Ad.

Levy and his partner have produced such TV shows as Dudley The Dragon, What's for Dinner, Jenny and The Queen of Light, Life's Little Miracles, It Seems Like Yesterday, and The Riots at Christie Pits.

For information, check at Breakthrough's Web site,-www.breakthroughfilm.com.

The Tree of Fools will air on the UNICEF-inspired International Day of Broadcasting, in which 170 countries are taking part.

"We were fortunate that Peter Moss, head of programming at YTV, was familiar with the Chelm story, because Young People's Theatre, which he headed, had done the Village of Idiots," Levy said.

The hoopoe asks three questions of King Solomon

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

People often think that those in power know a lot more than everyone else. We especially think that King Solomon, who ruled Israel a long, long time ago, knew just about everything.

After all, according to legend, not only was Solomon one of the wisest people who ever lived, but he could understand and speak to animals.

One of the famous stories that is told about him is the story of the hoopoe bird. Sheldon Oberman tells that story in The Wisdom Bird; A Tale of Solomon and Sheba (Boyds Mill Press, 2000).

You may have read other books by Oberman – like The Always Prayer Shawl, about a tallit that is passed down through several generations, or The White Stone in the Castle Wall, which is about Toronto's Casa Loma. As you may have guessed, he is a Canadian author – from Winnipeg, in fact.

In The Wisdom Bird, the Queen of Sheba (a country in Africa) comes to visit Solomon. She asks him to teach her something important.

Although he can solve all the problems his people bring to him, and can answer the many questions she asks him, that isn't enough.

Finally she asks him to build a palace out of bird beaks.

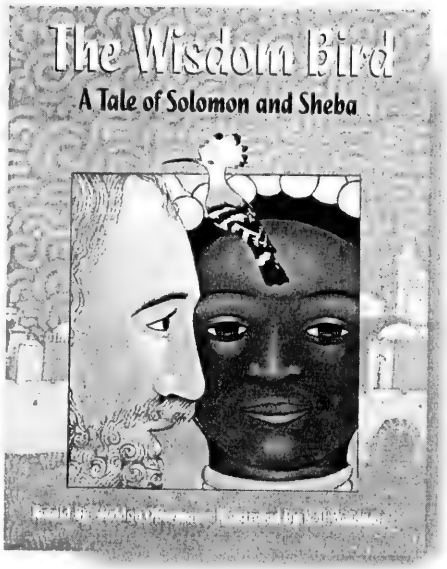
"That would take all the beaks of all the birds of the world," Solomon realizes.

Although he feels uncomfortable about it, he orders all the birds to come to him. Only the hoopoe disobeys, until he is forced to appear.

The hoopoe asks three questions of King Solomon:

"What was made the longest time ago and meant to last the longest time from now?

"What is so gentle it is used to feed a baby, yet so strong it is used to break through earth and wood, to build a home and to fight off enemies?



"And, what drop of water does not rise from the ground or fall from the sky?"

Can you answer this riddle? King Solomon can, and he comes to understand that "no matter who we are, we all have great things to learn, even from a little bird."

To thank the hoopoe for his lesson, Solomon and Sheba make a crown of gold for his head – which miraculously turns into a crown of golden feathers.

The Queen of Sheba is said to be one of the most beautiful women in the world. One of the legends is that the Ethiopian Jews who were brought to Israel in Operation Solomon in 1991 are descended from Jewish soldiers who escorted the queen back to her home after meeting with King Solomon.

The pictures, by Neil Waldman, are lovely. Each set of pages – the pages with words and the pictures that go with those words – has a different colour scheme.

Oberman has blended together stories that are told in Israel, Yemen and East Africa to make a book that you will really enjoy reading.

The Jewish side of Munich

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

MUNICH — Even though Munich was the birthplace of National Socialism, Munich provides surprising opportunities today for the visitor who is interested in Jewish history, past and present.

Germany now has one of the largest Jewish populations in Europe – 85,000 plus – a number that grows yearly with the arrival of immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

In Munich, the official figure for registered Jews is 3,254. Although far fewer in number than the apex of 11,000 in 1910, the figure begins to approach the 4,407 registered Jews of 1939.

My self-guided tour of Jewish Munich begins at 27 Reichenbachstrasse. After some searching, I find it, the site of the only Munich synagogue spared during Kristallnacht – because it was close to a German theatre, the Gartnerplatz.

The theatre is still there as well as the synagogue, along with its community centre, kosher restaurant and Jewish Museum.

Security is tight. I hand my passport to a guard behind bulletproof glass, who looks at it briefly and slides it back through the drawer. The synagogue is closed except for services, so we proceed to the small rooms that house the Jewish Museum, currently featuring a show about the history of Munich synagogues.

Our guide tells us the first Jewish community was established here in Munich in 1235; a synagogue was built in the main square, the Marienplatz, as early as 1380. When a building in the "pure Classical style" was opened in 1824, the king of Bavaria and his family were guests at the opening ceremonies.

A hundred-odd years later, the proud history of Munich synagogues ended. A striking documentary film runs continuously on a VCR; it shows the city's huge Marienplatz synagogue being demolished by modern machinery in June, 1938, by order of the Munich government.

Today a memorial stone marks the spot. All that is left – displayed before us – is a Torah mantle. Dark crimson, gold, and blue, this embroidered cloth represents a vanished era.

The American kids are bursting with questions: "What happened to the Torah?" several want to know.

"This question is very good; often we have this question," responds Richard Grimm, our guide. But he can provide no answer.

What is known is that 3,000 survivors from Theresienstadt returned to Munich in 1947 and reopened the single synagogue remaining in the city, the one a few steps away from where we stand. The Reichenbach Synagogue, was, in fact, one of the last to be built in Germany, in 1931.

Rachel Salamander

"Half the visitors to the museum are Jews, half are non-Jews," Herr Grimm says. "And we are moving to a bigger building. Not far from here, on the Jacobsplatz, a new community centre, school and museum will be built. A Europe-wide competition for the winning design has been announced."

Our affable guide, who also happens to be the museum's director, will turn over the reins to a government appointee.

Grimm, it turns out, is a gentile who has run the Munich Jewish Museum as a private institution for 10 years.

He's visited Israel a dozen times. Reaching into his wallet, he proudly produces a treasured photo from 1967. A youthful Grimm stands next to David Ben-Gurion.

The next morning, a short subway ride from the centre of town takes me to the University of Munich, home of the anti-Nazi White Rose Movement. Two students, Hans and Sophie Scholl, a brother and sister who led the group, and their professor, Kurt Huber, are memorialized in the names of the streets facing the campus.

In the campus, there is also a permanent memorial to their successful efforts to publicize the truth about battlefield reverses and the Final Solution during 1942-43 (all three were caught and executed).

A few streets away from the bustling campus, I discover Jewish Munich's best known modern success story – the Jewish bookstore at 17 Furstenstrasse, called Literatur Handlung. The window displays a wealth of books written in German, Yiddish, English and Russian.

Mordecai Richler's name catches my eye, though the title looks a trifle odd: Wie Barney Es Sieht.

Inside, the huge selection ranges from serious works on philosophy, editions of prayers and psalms, to CDs by Klezmer groups and Israeli pop stars. I'm tempted by everything from Anne Michaels' Fugitive Pieces to 501 Hebrew Baby Names. There are art books, passover cloths, menorahs and yarmulkes.

The brains behind this enterprise sits behind the desk, dressed in a stylish suit, looking rather like Sigourney Weaver. Rachel Salamander was born, she tells me, "in a DP camp in Germany."

Salamander's Polish parents had fled to the USSR, returned to Poland in 1946 and then fled again. "When the last camp was closed, we were half-an-hour from Munich, so we came here."

Rachel eventually received her doctorate in philosophy and literature from the University of Munich, but discovered she didn't like teaching.

"I felt it was our task, as the second generation, the postwar generation, to reconstruct what life was like before. To build something new, which was only possible if you knew the traditions. Everyone was enthusiastic about the idea; my friends helped me with money to get started. That was almost 20 years ago. For 10 years we've had a store in Berlin."

Another store opened in Fürth in the Jewish Museum, and two more German stores are in the planning stages.

Salamander's store rapidly became an institution. "At first we specialized in Jewish subjects after the Nazi era," she says. "We then tried to reconstruct the vanished world of the Jews of Europe. On Nov. 17, 1982, we began our authors' series."

To her surprise, 150 people showed up to hear Israeli writer, David Rokeach. Audiences were soon overflowing the store, and new venues were found for the near-weekly events.

Twelve hundred people came to hear Elie Wiesel; last year Danny Goldhagen (Hitler's Willing Executioners) drew an audience of 2,400 to the Philharmonic Hall.

"There's a new group of young Jewish writers too," she continues, "they are the second and third generation. They write in German about the Holocaust and German-Jewish problems."

In addition to selling books and running its popular speakers' program, the bookstore mails its inventory worldwide, and has launched a Web site. (http://home.t-online. de/home/Literaturhandlung)

"A very agreeable city," is Salamander's verdict on her adopted hometown. "It's not political like Berlin; there's law and order; people are secure to express their opinions."

Passages: To judge from her poetry, Libby Scheier, the Toronto poet who died last month of cancer, was not afraid of confronting difficult realities.

Three years ago, Scheier watched her father die, and recorded her own and her family's descent into a maelstrom of grief, bitterness and reconciliation with the past. The result was Kaddish For My Father, a long work of poetry and prose modelled on Allen Ginsberg's landmark poem Kaddish and infused with various tenets of mystical Judaism and the memory of a difficult but loving father-daughter relationship.

Scheier, who had taught creative writing at York University and founded the Toronto Writing Workshop, presented that poem and a collection of others in Kaddish For My Father: New and Selected Poems, 1970-1999. With her passing, the book, published by ECW Press last year, has become an unintended retrospective of her life's work.

Reviewers have responded enthusiastically to Scheier's work. Saturday Night called her poetry "so natural it can take the top of anybody's head off," while the Toronto Star, where Scheier was a literary columnist for a brief period, said that she "has the skewed, half-violent intensity of insight that distinguishes Atwood at her best."

Scheier, who was in her early 50s, leaves a son to continue the cycle of kaddish.

Actor's career comes full circle with classic kids' play

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Actor Alon Nashman, 41, is currently starring as Thorin Oakenshield in the mystical children's classic, The Hobbit by J. R. R. Tolkien, at Toronto's Young People's Theatre.

Although Nashman describes himself as a "Jewish actor about town", more accurate would be, Jewish actor about theatre since he racks up one success after another on our city's stages.

In The Hobbit, Nashman's character guides his crew of dwarves on a quest to reclaim his kingdom, gold and honour from the dragon.

"I like playing in front of kids," states the father of three, Tiferet, 6, Hershel, 3, and Neshama, 1.

"I find children's response is instinctual, raw and real. When the play is engaging, the kind of attention they give it is so involved and passionate. I should also say, this play has a big appeal to adults who remember reading The Hobbit. I'm surprised how many people are coming without kids. This production is gloriously popular, we are selling out."

Nashman's career has come full circle. At the age of six, he played the lead dwarf in a summer camp production of Snow White.

"I got my start in theatre at Camp Wahanowin on Lake Couchiching, where my parents were the directors. The theatre program there was very important part of the summer experience and I ended up being in musicals every year.

"As camp director, my father Harold was definitely an entertainer. I got my sense of humour and showmanship from my dad. From my mother Yetta, who died last July, I got a certain sensitivity, emotional quality and compassion. I bring all of that, on a good day, to my acting," says Nashman.

Holy Blossom exhibits work of new artists

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The works of seven talented young artists reflect the diversity of their lives.

A multi-media exhibition, titled Jewish Women Artists: New Generation, is currently showing the works of these university students at Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St., to Dec. 26.

The group, all in their 20s, includes Michelle Astrug, Chana Holder, Aliza Klein, Ronit Novak, Yulia Shtern, Limore Twena, and Rachel Weinstock.

The artists are currently studying or have recently graduated from York University, Ryerson University, and the Ontario College of Art and Design.

The varied media techniques and subject matter reflect differences in their style and background. The artists' biographical and spiritual roots are in Canada, Israel, Poland and Russia.

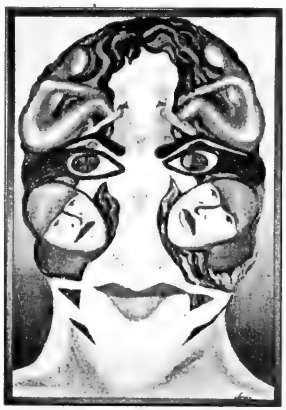
Each artist wears her Judaism differently – from highly visible to an underlying tug.

Jacob Wrestling Angel by Chana Holder.

The subject matters range from biblical themes and spiritual motifs to avant-garde state-of-the-art concepts.

The seven artists first exhibited together, with several others, at the Colouring Ourselves Festival of Creativity in March 2000 which was sponsored by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

"Each artist is at the threshold of her artistic career, facing the infinite possibilities of achievement lying ahead," says Anita Lerek, a member of Holy Blossom Temple's Fine Arts Committee and curator of the exhibition.



Complexity by Limore Twena

"When I saw the Jewish Campus exhibition at the Poor Alex Theatre last spring, I was so impressed to see the creativity of these young Jewish artists," noted Lerek.

"I felt it was heartening that these talented artists took pride in their Jewish roots."

Lerek, a lawyer who has served as a docent at the Art Gallery of Ontario, said that for the young artists, "everything at this stage is about looking, feeling and choice – with one's background, experiences and religious identity often helping to define the way."

The biblical matter includes Holder's Jacob Wrestling Angel, Hagar and Yishmael, Twena's King David and others.

There are a variety of prints, photographs, acrylics on canvas, oils, graphic design, and multiples.

The acrylic paintings of Weinstock, with reflection and contemplation as their themes, contrast with Shtern's acrylic works. One of Shtern's paintings creatively presents the coming together of St. Petersburg and Jerusalem.

Klein, who designed the logo for the show, exhibits her graphic designs. Novak's 30-piece photographic exhibition, Twena's giclee prints and Astrug's mixed media images round up an eclectic exhibition that encompasses traditional art and contemporary techniques and themes.

Esther Hersh, who co-chairs the Fine Arts Committee with Beryl Chernin, said "our committee is happy to give some exposure to these young university student artists."

Lerek said the Fine Arts Committee looks forward to giving exposure in the future to young talented male artists with a body of artistic work.

Prices for the works in the Jewish Women Artists exhibition range from $65 to $2,000. The exhibition is open to the community from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Sunday to Thursday, and from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. on Fridays.

While studying history and English at the University of Toronto, Nashman involved himself in a number of campus theatrical productions at Trinity College, Hart House and U.C. Playhouse.

In 1987, he moved to Montreal to attend National Theatre School. After graduation, Nashman went to Israel to deepen his connection with Judaism.

While in Israel, in addition to meeting his wife Elizabeth who coincidentally grew up five blocks away from his Toronto home, Nashman secured a regular role as a coroner on the CBS action series, Sweating Bullets.

When the series' shooting moved to South Africa for six months, the newlyweds relocated, considering it an expense-paid honeymoon.

Back in Canada in '93, the thespian's first theatrical tour was Jesus Met Nanabush for the Native Canadian Theatre Company, De-Ba-Jeh-Mu-Jig Theatre, based out of Manitoulin Island.

"I played Jesus as a Jew. The play addressed the resurgence of native spirituality. It was emblematic of the plays I like to do, in that it agitated peoples' souls. I like to do plays that go deep and cause people to think about their existence in a whole new way."

Nashman's other credits include Traders, Due South, The Newsroom, Our Hero and Robocop in film and on television.

He has graced the stage in Howl, A Short History of Night, Reading Hebron, Wedding Day at the Cromagnons and None is Too Many. Future plans include performing in The Hotel next May at Theatre Passe Muraille.

In 1999, Nashman became artistic director of a company called Theaturtle, producing a play at Theatre Passe Muraille called The Song, inspired from the Song of Songs from the Bible.

Last summer, his company produced Alphonse, a one-man show he self-directed and starred in at the Bloor JCC Courtyard during the Fringe Festival. Thanks to rave reviews and response, there are plans to reproduce Alphonse on a mainstage in Toronto.

Alon Nashman

"It has been very gratifying to develop my own projects, to do shows that come of my essence and put them forward to be successful. Those are purer acts of creativity than being hired by somebody. So, The Song and Alphonse were peak experiences. I have a number of other projects in the works that I'm looking forward to developing," says Nashman.

"I have a strong preference for theatre, in that theatre is a real sharing, a community event. The audience is a participant involved in building the energy in the space where the performance is taking place. The kind of magic that can happen in the spontaneity of theatre is more profound to me than the magic found in the manicured and manufactured world of film and television."

Nashman is in The Hobbit at the Young People's Theatre, 166 Front St. E., until Dec. 21.

Kadosh amongst newly released Jewish-interest movies

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The year 2000 is ending strongly with three Jewish releases that have arrived at video stores recently.

Judy Berlin, the quirky comedy that appeared at the 1999 Toronto Jewish Film Festival and received great critical reaction at the Sundance Festival, was released on video in early November.

This prize winning film tells the story of David Gold, a failed actor who has returned home to live in his parents' house. He runs into Judy Berlin, a former schoolmate, who is leaving for Hollywood to try her luck as an actress. Her high expectations clash with David's dashed hopes and force David to reappraise his life.

Much of the action in Judy Berlin takes place during an eclipse, which gives the black and white film an eerie atmosphere.

Judy Berlin marked Madeline Kahn's final film appearance. She died a short time after completing this role after a long battle with cancer.

The television miniseries Nuremberg which was broadcast in September is now out on video.

The video, an edited version of the four-hour miniseries, tells the story of the momentous trial of the leading Nazi war criminals who were captured by the Allies and put on trial a short time after the conclusion of World War II.

This miniseries gives a somewhat different point of view from that of the original film, Judgment At Nuremberg, produced in the 1960s.

The TV show features Alex Baldwin as the chief American prosecutor and has a terrific performance by Colm Feore as Rudolf Hoess.

One of the best Israeli films in some time, Kadosh, is now on video.

Amos Gitai directed this passionate film set in the Haredi quarter of Mea Shearim in Jerusalem.

The story centres on two sisters and how they deal with the pressures and demands of living in a strictly Orthodox community.

The first sister is married to a gentle, loving husband but the couple has been childless throughout their 10-year marriage.

Their rabbi advises the husband to divorce his wife and marry another woman. The husband accepts this edict, unaware that his wife has sought expert medical advice and has been told that she is not the one with the problem.

The younger sister has had a husband chosen for her by her father, but she rebels against being forced into a loveless marriage.

Judy Berlin was released by Blackwatch Releasing and Kadosh is available through Mongrel Media. Both are priced at rental prices, meaning that if you want to own one of these, you are going to have to pay in excess of $100.

Nuremberg, on the other hand, is being released immediately at a low price by Alliance Atlantis Home Video and can be purchased right now for under $20.

Business Profile

Assante provides financial services for top stars

Clients include Tom Cruise, David Letterman

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the bureaucratic jargon of corporate culture, Martin (Marty) Weinberg is a "provider of life management services."

Weinberg, the 39-year-old president and chief executive officer of the Winnipeg-based Assante Corporation, caters to what company literature refers to as "a very select group of affluent and high-net-worth individuals and families."

Formed by Weinberg and partner Michael Nairne in 1995, Assante currently has $30 billion in assets under administration.

Backed up by a corps of tax lawyers, accountants and financial analysts, Assante offers clients in Canada and the United States services ranging from wealth management and bill payment arrangements to retirement planning.

Some of its clients, particularly the professional athletes and show business personalities, are household names: actor Tom Cruise, film producer Jerry Bruckheimer, talk show host David Letterman, actress Roseanne Barr, hockey player Mark Messier, tennis star Ivan Lendl, National Football League quarterback Troy Aikman, and heavyweight boxing champion Lennox Lewis.

The vast majority of Assante's clients, however, remain contentedly anonymous – a plastic surgeon here, a merchant there. What they all have in common is an uncommon knack for acquiring wealth and knowing where to place it for safekeeping and growth.

Although Assante – a public company since 1999 – is best known for managing the assets of sports and entertainment celebrities whose combined income exceeded $1 billion last year, Weinberg plays down its connection with the rich and famous.

"We have not gone Hollywood," he said in an interview during a recent visit to Toronto.

Assante, one of the three largest sports management companies in North America, blossomed into the conglomerate it is today when Weinberg and Nairne, a fellow Winnipegger, joined forces.

At the time, Weinberg was president of Loring Ward Investment Counsel Ltd., which he founded while working for his father-in-law, and Nairne headed up The Equion Group. Both specialized in trust fund and estate planning.

Having consolidated their operations, the pair went on an aggressive buying spree, purchasing 17 smaller firms in Canada and six in the United States.

One of their American acquisitions was Steinberg Moorad & Dunn, the principal of which is the legendary sports agent Leigh Steinberg, the inspiration for Tom Cruise's role in the movie Jerry Maguire.

Asked why he targeted companies with a high clientele concentration of actors and athletes, Weinberg replied, "As a group, they tend to delegate responsibility for their financial affairs. They are ideal candidates for our life-management services."

Weinberg, who works out of a 15th-floor office at the corner of Portage and Main, did not get off to a fast start as an investment manager.

As he is fond of recalling, he launched his career when, as an ambitious commerce student, he started an investment club at the University of Manitoba.

"I lost half of everyone's money," he said with a smile, attributing his setback to a slavish devotion to traditional investment methods.

Determined not to be burned again, Weinberg learned, among other things, to read brokerage reports.

After graduating, he applied for a job at at Great-West Life Assurance Co., where his father, Israel, had toiled as an actuary until he was killed in a car accident when Weinberg was only six.

Rejected as unsuitable by Great-West, Weinberg was hired by Investors Syndicate, Canada's largest mutual fund company, as an investment analyst.

By then, he was married to Gina Frieman, whose father, Arnold, was a Hungarian Holocaust survivor. The Weinbergs have two children, Mara, 12, and Cayli, 8.

Weinberg, whose Russian and Polish grandparents were farmers in Edenbridge, a Jewish agricultural colony in the prairies, rose to portfolio manager at Investors Syndicate.

Martin Weinberg

In 1986, four years after joining that firm, Weinberg quit. He went to work for his father-in-law – the owner of Advance Electronics, a television and stereo store – as a controller.

"I thought I'd be there for a long time."

With his father-in-law's encouragement, Weinberg started his own business, Loring Ward Investment Counsel Ltd. "I decided I wanted to build something my way," he explained.

Weinberg, having acquired valuable skills at Advance Electronics, positioned Loring Ward as an innovative operation with an array of financial experts under one roof.

It was an idea whose time had come, but when he tried to sell the concept on Bay Street, the heart of Canadian banking and finance, he was all but rebuffed. "They claimed it wouldn't work."

Weinberg, however, was unbowed and undeterred.

Several years later, he returned to Toronto, bent on finding partners who could help him expand Loring Ward. He stumbled upon Nairne, a mutual fund dealer.

The rest, as they say, is history.

Weinberg and his family now live in Tuxedo, one of Winnipeg's most upscale neighbourhoods. Weinberg's older sister, Caron, and younger brother, Gary, also live in Winnipeg. Caron was Weinberg's first employee; Gary runs a landscaping company.

Weinberg attributes his success to vision, long hours, tenacity and the loyalty of 3,000 employees, among whom are a braintrust of 1,600 advisors and 400 assistants.

Raised in Winnipeg's River Heights district, Weinberg has no intention of moving Assante's headquarters to a bigger city like, say, Toronto.

"I built my hand-picked management team in Winnipeg," said Weinberg, who usually recruits staff from the University of Manitoba.

A scuba diver, mountain biker and collector of movie props, Weinberg does not rule out further acquisitions in Canada to bolster Assante's bulk.

"In the United States, our goal is to grow until we can firmly establish our dominance in the channels we operate in."

And judging by recent newspaper reports, Assante plans to launch a virtual bank, with credit and debit cards, by the end of 2000.

"We're a high-growth, exciting, young company," said Weinberg in a moment of enthusiasm.

That, to say the least, is an understatement.

Visual cues seen better for those with dementia

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To help family members who have dementia, show them what to do, instead of telling them in words, says the director of psychology at Baycrest Centre.

"Show [them] and shut up; they will do 50 to 60 percent better," advised Dr. Guy Proulx, speaking recently as part of the Ada Starkman lecture series at Baycrest.

Research at the hospital by Dr. Enid Tulving, Dr. Cheryl Grady, himself and others has shown that elderly people use a different part of the brain, one that responds better to visual stimulation than verbal instruction, Proulx said.

In a talk peppered with stories drawn from his own experiences, Proulx, 49, told a large crowd that people with dementia, including those who have Alzheimer's disease, can be trained to do things that will improve their quality of life.

This is important at Baycrest where the average age of residents is now 89 and many have five or six medical problems, he said.

Proulx said, for example, that it is better to show a woman what dress to wear, rather than telling her to put it on.

People helping those with dementia should use frequent repetition and try to avoid verbal corrections, he added.

Environment is also important, he said. He told of a woman who, in her own kitchen, never stopped asking her visitor son if he had had anything to eat, but when she visited her daughter, "she was treated like a queen; she wasn't in her own kitchen."

Studies done at Baycrest and other places have shown that some people with dementia can be trained at home to learn new knowledge. These people generally do better than those who go to an institution without that kind of training.

For example, he said, despite being intelligent, some people cannot find words to express themselves. He told of one person with a memory problem who was trained at home and now volunteers to help slow readers. "He can't remember things, but he is teaching new skills."

There is new hope for people with dementia because of "incredible research in new technology," being done at Baycrest, which has become a world leader in the field, Proulx said.

A lot of the problems elderly people have with memory involves paying attention; for instance, they should write down where they left their car in the parking lot, he said.

The object at Baycrest is to "bridge the gaps" between the brain, environment and behaviour, he said.

On another subject, Proulx said women do better after a stroke than men because of progesterone, a female hormone. He said it may not be long before men who suffer strokes will be treated with progesterone.

But, he cautioned, "I advise people who think they have had a stroke to get to hospital right away. There will be less damage down the road."

New Web site teaches about memory loss

TORONTO — Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Seneca College have launched Memory Loss and Dementia, an interactive Web site that educates the public about normal memory loss as a result of aging, and the more serious abnormal changes associated with dementia.

"For people who have a relative with dementia, the site describes the behavioural changes to expect and how to manage these behaviours in a way that minimizes the disabilities," says Dr. Guy Proulx, director of psychology at Baycrest.

"If your parent has some memory loss or a dementia such as Alzheimer's disease for example, this Web site will help you to communicate with your parent more effectively."

The site is also useful for people concerned about their own memory as they age.

"It's a fact that memory changes as we age, but the public needs to understand the difference between normal forgetfulness — forgetting where you put the car keys — and abnormal changes that may signal the onset of a dementia such as Alzheimer's," Proulx says.

He and other Baycrest psychologists provided the content for the Web site, while Seneca College designed the Web-based program using its expertise in adult learning principles and curriculum design. The Web site is divided into two parts: The first looks at normal memory changes as we age, and the second focuses on abnormal memory loss that occurs with Alzheimer's disease and vascular dementia.

To get to the site, go to Baycrest's Web site, www.baycrest.org. There is a direct link to the site on the home page and also by clicking on "education" and then "on-line learning."

To purchase the CD ROM version of Memory Loss and Dementia, call Baycrest Centre at 416-785-2500, ext. 2365.

Cantor celebrates Grey Cup for third time

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some guys play in the Canadian Football League for years and never get a sniff at the Grey Cup.

Not Noah Cantor. Grey Cups seem to follow him wherever he plays. In his six years in the CFL, Cantor has played in the championship game three times and won three times – twice with the Argos and this year, with the B.C. Lions.

It's a record that Cantor is grateful to possess. He knows how tough it is to win even one championship and in the days before this year's classic, Cantor and his teammates discussed their good fortune at reaching the pinnacle of CFL competition.

Speaking in the heady aftermath of the Lions' 28 to 26 win over Montreal, Cantor was still savouring the victory. "All week (before the Cup) we spoke about guys 10 years in the league who don't get there," he said. "It's a great feeling to see your teammates celebrate. It's a great feeling.

"You put in all that work during the season and in the off season, and to win a championship, it meets all your goals."

For Cantor, all three Cup wins have been sweet, but this one might have been a little bit sweeter. In previous years, Cantor was a backup lineman and a special teams player – important roles but still not a starter. In previous Cups, he got into the big game but he didn't get to play every down.

This year was different. From day one, Cantor was a starter and a linchpin in the Leo's defensive formations. He lined up in the nose tackle position and butted heads on every play. The Ottawa native played in every game but one – the one that fell on Yom Kippur – registering 34 tackles and five sacks during the season.

At six-foot-four, 265 lbs., Cantor was one of the key men called upon to stuff the Montreal Alouettes' running game – Mike Pringle in particular. The Lions defensive line, anchored by Cantor, limited the Als' top back to 115 yards on 20 carries, a key factor in the team's victory.

Lions peak in time for the playoffs

Going into the championship game, "we knew they were going to run the ball at us. It was important to stick to your 'keys' and do your job."

As the nosetackle, Cantor lines up across from the offensive centre on pretty much every play. His "key" is to follow the centre on the expectation that where the centre goes, the ball carrier will follow. The trick is not to go so far as to let the centre get outside him and block him away from the running back.

Pringle, who reportedly was nursing a hamstring injury, wasn't as much of a factor as he might have been. The Lions' defence, which had come in for criticism early in the season, rose to the occasion and limited the vaunted Als' running game.

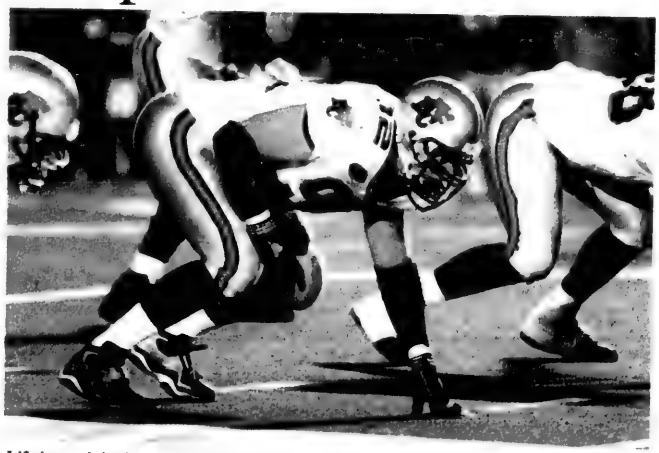
Cantor isn't surprised the Lions' defence was strong at the end. The team entered the 2000 season on the heels of a 13 to 5 record in '99 and was tops in most defensive statistics.

Despite a slow start in 2000, Cantor, who earned a starting job midway through the '99 season, said that "as a defence, we thought we played pretty good."

By midseason, however, the Lions were in a state of upheaval. Head coach Greg Mohns left the team for an opportunity in the XFL and the team's defensive co-ordinator was subsequently fired. "We were completely shocked," Cantor said. "We had to start all over again in mid season."

It took a while, but the defence eventually gelled. By playoff time, the Lions were hot and getting hotter.

There was plenty of confidence among the players. "A lot of people didn't believe we could do it. We did," he said.



Life is tough in the football pit. Noah Cantor sets himself in a three-point stance prior to the snap of the ball in a road game (above) while he powers by a blocker at home (below). [Photos by Rik Fedyck of pic this....PHOTOGRAPHY]

In the Western final, the Lions dominated Calgary for much of the game, although a late surge by the Stampeders gave them a scare. The Als too were dominated early, but they stunned the Lions with a late touchdown to make it close. A two-point conversion failed and the Lions held on to claim the victory.

Cantor said that throughout the playoffs, the Lions remained "confident. Those games didn't seem as tough as games during the year. We knew if we got on a roll, we had the talent to win," he said.

Victory celebrations were particularly joyful this year. His wife (of less than one year), Donna (née Caplan), along with Noah's parents Bev and Dan from Ottawa, as well as his brother Mark, all joined him for the post game parties.

Once the victory celebrations die down, Cantor will have to consider his playing future. He's a free agent and can entertain offers from any CFL team, although he hopes to re-sign with Vancouver.

About Teens

Dear Karilani

I have a problem with the fact that most of the friends I hang around with do drugs. Recently, when we were together they asked me if I wanted some dope. I said no and started making excuses about how I am on medication and can't smoke or drink. But they didn't believe me. They either tease me or shun me. I would stop hanging out with them but I have been friends with them since I was young. It's very difficult for me to start making new friends. What should I do?

Anonymous

Dear Anonymous:

Since when has the word "friend" been defined as someone who "teases and shuns" you? Never. If your friends are doing that, you should question whether or not they are real friends. A friend should never pressure you into doing something you are opposed to.

Because it's hard not to give in to peer pressure, you should be commended on your ability to stay strong in resisting them. Be straightforward and explain to your closest friends how you feel about this. Tell them how much this has upset you and how disappointed you are with them. If they don't understand and continue to make fun of you, it's time to hang out with people who will appreciate a friend who can resist peer pressure. It may be difficult at the start, but in the long run you will feel very proud that you didn't let yourself become part of a group of "followers" and instead became a strong "leader."

Karilani is actually three girls in high school. The drawing is a fiction. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

A New Generation Jumps Into Campaign Total Tops $35 million

The growing commitment of a new generation of community leaders is propelling Campaign 2001 - The Campaign For Our Children - toward record numbers. The Campaign has passed the $35 million mark on its way to a $45 million objective, with four million dollars in additional donations and increases averaging 14% over last year. Increased contributions will be designated for programs to assist children at risk and bring young people closer to Jewish life.

It's an objective that is particularly attractive to Jewish young adults. "The 25 - 40 year old population of Jewish Toronto is waking up to taking a role in the community. UJA FEDERATION is involving them by appealing to all their different interests," said Jay Papernick, of the Young Business & Professionals Network.

HOT canvass heating up

The Young Leadership Cabinet (YLC) is noting gift increases averaging more than 21 per cent and Michael Long, an active force in YLC's Hands on Toronto (HOT) reports a rise in HOT's canvassing efforts. "Historically, HOT worked, as its name implies, in a hands-on activity-based way with beneficiary agencies to help their clients. This year, we realized that focus doesn't preclude canvassing and, in fact, our direct agency work shows us just what campaign dollars can do."

According to Sarit Goldman and David Spiro of the Young Lawyers Network, this year's campaign theme is very close to the hearts of their members as well. "The Young Lawyers Network is undertaking a new initiative to lend legal advice and legal aid resources to women and children in crisis through Jewish Family & Child Service, a UJA FEDERATION supported agency. We also will be holding a Work-a-thon in the new year in which our Network will be encouraged to work a day for UJA, donating one day's salary to Campaign 2001," Spiro said.

For many young leaders, a first taste of UJA FEDERATION came through participating in an Israel overseas mission. "I had been aware of Jews in need in the former Soviet Union before, but being there and seeing how UJA FEDERATION helps put a human face to the problem," said Betty Gertstein of the Young Leadership Cabinet.

Partners in leadership

"Visiting our projects in Eilat/Eilot and talking with the emerging young leadership, we saw where our campaign dollars go and we felt just how much these young Israelis want to get involved, to help and strengthen the vulnerable in their community," echoed Nancy Klein who recently returned from Israel as part of a UJA FEDERATION Partnership 2000 Young Leadership Mission.

Another exciting avenue for campaign involvement by young leaders is through education. On December 10, the Young Leadership Cabinet is hosting a special Brunch and Learn program at Beth Tikvah Synagogue which will feature Rabbi Eli Garfinkel in an interactive look at tzedakah.

For additional information on this exciting program, contact Jared Isaacson at 416 631-5732.

Arafat's Failed Tactics

A former U.S. presidential advisor, who believes that Yassir Arafat's strategy of violence has failed, was in the spotlight of UJA FEDERATION Israel advocacy efforts last week.

"Arafat (Chairman of the Palestine National Authority) is now facing the law of diminishing returns," said Jay Footlik, a former Special Assistant to President Bill Clinton and Clinton's principal liaison to the American Jewish community, at a meeting of UJA FEDERATION campaign canvassers.

Footlik, one of several UJA FEDERATION guest experts who have recently spoken in Toronto, conceded that Arafat may have scored some propaganda victories by "sending children to the front," but he has not made any diplomatic gains. "He is privately being urged by many Arab leaders and certainly by the United States to return to the bargaining table."

The key question, according to Footlik, is whether Arafat has lost control of the forces he set in motion. "Some of my contacts are telling me that he has," said Footlik. "But I think he has made a decision for peace and in his own way he will inch toward agreements with Israel."

Footlik, who met Arafat while working at the White House, described him as "a very shrewd figure, who is intelligent and reads situations well."

These days, Footlik lives in Tel Aviv, where he works at the Peres Centre for Peace as an advisor to former Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres. In Toronto, he addressed a standing-room only crowd of key UJA FEDERATION campaigners at the Riocan offices of Campaign Co-Chair Ed Sonshine.

Former U.S. presidential advisor Jay Footlik addressed a special reception for campaign canvassers last week in Toronto. (l/r) Joan Shapero, Jay Footlik, Marcie Somers.

Who will be the candidates?

Benjamin Netanyahu returned to Jerusalem on Sunday to declare he wanted to be a candidate for prime minister in the upcoming election necessitated by Ehud Barak's surprise resignation. To run as the Likud party leader, Netanyahu would have to unseat the party's current leader Ariel Sharon.

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — No sooner had the dust of Prime Minister Ehud Barak's surprise resignation announcement settled than former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu stepped onto centre stage at the King David Hotel and announced his candidacy for the post of prime minister.

While Netanyahu's declaration was expected, what still remains unclear is the nature of the upcoming elections and whether Netanyahu's candidacy will be possible.

Netanyahu arrived from the United States in the early evening hours on Sunday, and by 8 p.m. was facing reporters who awaited his announcement. He criticized Prime Minister Ehud Barak and his government for "degrading Israel's deterrent power" in its handling of the Palestinians and the Hezbollah, and declared his candidacy for the post of prime minister.

Netanyahu presented his 3½ years in power in a positive light, while declaring Barak's resignation "a clear admission of failure." He also accused his political rival of trying to hold the prime minister's seat while "bypassing the people's will."

Earlier in the day, Barak chaired the weekly cabinet meeting and officially informed his ministers of his decision to resign. By 2 p.m., he had presented his letter of resignation to President Moshe Katsav. He also informed Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg of his decision, as required by law.

Barak resigns, Netanyahu enters fray, Sharon's future unclear

The letter was short: "According to the instructions of Article 23(A) of the Basic Law on the Government, and following the announcement of my decision to the government, I inform you of my resignation from the post of prime minister." His resignation was to take effect Tuesday.

At a joint press conference, both Barak and Katsav expressed their hope that the upcoming election campaign will be "short, decisive, fair and to the point."

Paradoxically, it is still uncertain what kind of election will be held (if, indeed, any is held at all), and who the candidates will be. Several options exist, and various processes are in motion. Barak's resignation on Saturday night has created a situation in which special elections for prime minister must be held within 60 days, by Feb. 6, 2001, and which exclude any candidates who are not currently MKs. That automatically disqualifies Netanyahu.

Nonetheless, Netanyahu's supporters are trying to alter the Basic Law on the Government to allow their candidate to participate in the special election for prime minister. Efforts toward that end were initiated by Likud MKs as early as Oct. 30, but the legislation cannot be brought to the plenum for a vote for 45 days.

The News in Brief

CANADA

For Science Whizzes

TORONTO — Selected science students will be chosen to represent Canada this summer at the Dr. Bessie F. Lawrence 33rd International Summer Science Institute at the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot July2-27, 2001. The program is for students in their last year of secondary school, and who excel in science. The deadline for applications is March 1, 2001. For details, call Sheri Federman at 416-733-9220 or at weizmann@inforamp.net

ISRAEL

Appeal Rejected

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court has rejected an appeal from a businessman who was sentenced to 16 years in prison for selling Iran information and materials to produce chemical weapons. Nahum Manbar claimed that Israeli security officials were aware of his activities, which he said did not endanger state security.

Depression in Women

JERUSALEM — Almost twice as many Israeli women as men suffer from depression, according to a new study. Thirty-nine percent of Israeli women suffer from depression and related effects, compared to 21 percent of men, the study said.

Rocket Launched

JERUSALEM — An Israeli observation satellite was launched last week aboard a Russian rocket from Russia's Far East. From its position in space, the Eros-A1 satellite will be able to photograph objects as small as six feet, according to Russian and Israeli sources. The satellite will circle the earth once every 100 minutes.

WORLD

Costa Rica Acts

SAN JOSE — After 16 years of legal battles, a Costa Rican court has rejected an appeal by an alleged Nazi war criminal, paving the way for his deportation from the country. Bogdan Koziy, a former member of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, is alleged to have actively participated in the murder of five Jewish families in the town of Lysiec in 1942 and 1943.

Romanians Gather

IASI, Romania — Led by Canadian filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, a few dozen survivors and relatives of the 13,000 Jews murdered in the 1941 Iasi pogrom gathered here last week to mark the first public Holocaust memorial in this northeastern city. Jacobovici, whose father was wounded in the pogrom, erected a plaque to honour Jewish victims of Romania's collaboration with the Nazis.

Int'l Get Day

NEW YORK — L'mann B'nos Yisrael International, the New York-based organization dedicated to helping the plight of agunot (women denied a get, or Jewish divorce decree) has declared Dec. 19 a pre-Chanukah Agunot Get Day. Batei din will be prepared worldwide to facilitate the get process, and the organization will cover the cost of the sofer "in an attempt to participate in the mitzvah," said Matti Klein, founder and president of the organization.

Pope-Haider Meeting?

ROME — Protests are mounting over a meeting expected to take place later this month between Pope John Paul II and Austrian far-right leader Joerg Haider. Israel issued a statement last week warning of the consequences of such a meeting, and its ambassador to the Holy See expressed concerns to the Vatican. Italian Jewish and leftist groups were discussing possible protest measures.

Cemetery Attacked

JOHANNESBURG — In one of the worst acts of anti-Semitic vandalism in South Africa in recent years, a Jewish cemetery in the town of Lichtenburg was vandalized. About 60 graves in the cemetery were targeted in this month's incident. More than half of the tombstones were broken, and the remainder pushed over. There was no anti-Semitic graffiti, but in a number of instances dead snakes were left on the graves.

Lieberman Protest

NEW YORK — Hundreds of people protested the contested U.S. presidential race outside the Connecticut home of Democratic vice-presidential candidate Joseph Lieberman. Democrats charged Lieberman's critics with anti-Semitism for holding the rally on a Saturday. Lieberman, who is Orthodox, was in Washington at the time.

Pricey Talmud

NEW YORK — Ten volumes from the 1520 Bomberg edition of the Talmud have sold for $1.2 million at the New York-based auction house of Kestenbaum & Co. Purchased by an anonymous Jewish buyer, the tractates were part of the London Beit Din Library, established in the 18th century by Britain's first chief rabbi, Solomon Hirschell.

UN Dismisses Malcolm Ross Complaint

UNITED NATIONS — The UN Human Rights Committee has dismissed a complaint from Holocaust-denying Canadian teacher Malcolm Ross.

The committee found that Canadian courts were correct in ruling that Ross "contributed to the creation of a poisoned environment" in his school district.

Ross, a one-time teacher in Moncton, had appealed to the UN, saying Canada violated his right to free speech and religion under the UN's Bill of Rights.

His complaint was based on the Supreme Court of Canada's upholding in 1995 of an earlier ruling by a board of inquiry under the New Brunswick Human Rights Commission. The board had ruled that Ross's writings and views were anti-Semitic, and that he should be removed from the classroom.

The UN committee found that Canadian actions were not aimed at Ross's beliefs but at "the manifestation of those beliefs within a particular context."

Registered nursing care set to be cut at Baycrest

New model introduced at Jewish Home for the Aged

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Registered nursing care will be one of the main casualties of cutbacks at Baycrest's Jewish Home for the Aged, relatives and friends of residents were told in a panel meeting last week.

A new model of care that was unveiled at the meeting showed RN staff reduced from three per floor to one per floor on the day shift (7 a.m. to 3 p.m.), and from three per floor to one per floor for the entire home on the other two shifts.

Nurses will be transferred to vacancies in other parts of the facility.

At the same time, some of the slack will be taken up by increasing the number of registered practical nurses (RPNs) and health care workers.

The dining room staff and recreation therapists will stay the same.

Other changes include the moving of residents who become more ill from the home to chronic care facilities, the reduction of social work staff, differences in testing and the exploring of alternatives in medication dosage.

The new model of care, explained Baycrest CEO Stephen W. Herbert, is to offset a reduction in government funding by $1.5 million per year over the past five years, for a total of $6 million in cutbacks.

The current reality, according to vice president of finance Laurie Harrison, is that there is a deficit of $9.6 million.

Spread over the entire Baycrest Centre operation, which comprises 20 different legal entities, including the hospital, there is a $4.6 million shortfall.

This works out to $55.94 per resident per day.

"We can't continue to incur this shortfall, without jeopardizing the future of the Jewish Home for the Aged and Baycrest," said Harrison. "We must be here for future generations."

The administration and the board have been lobbying municipal, provincial and federal governments on behalf of the institution, Harrison said, but long-term care is not a high profile issue at the present time.

Vice president of nursing services Mary Ferguson-Paré said that while a "state of the art" model of care had been developed for the new building, delays in the move prevented it from being implemented.

In addition, the "size and [architecture] of the building has impacted on delivery of care," Ferguson-Paré said.

"It seems that there are great distances to be covered both by staff and residents."

The new model, she said, will enable the JHA to "function in a more homelike manner, by offering more choice and flexibility in daily activities, more opportunity to form relationships, and achieve a maximum level of independence."

The challenge, Ferguson-Paré admitted, is "to do all that without exacerbating any of those issues."

Some of the other changes will include more emergency support, more training of RPNs and health care aides, and more volunteer recruitment.

The physicians will discuss ways of dispensing on a daily or twice daily basis rather than three times, whenever possible. While emergency lab tests will be done when needed, routine lab tests will be done one day per week.

Baycrest's commitment to allow the residents to "age in place" has not changed, Ferguson-Paré said. The emphasis now is on maintaining a population that is medically stable. Those who need more care will be transferred to either the Baycrest Hospital or to other chronic care locations.

The new model of care will begin Feb. 1, 2001, and will be considered a pilot project for eight months. At the end of that time, it will be evaluated by staff, administration, residents and families.

The audience at the meeting was not impressed with this information. Long lines formed at the microphones as soon as question-period facilitator Dorothy Pringle, a member of the board of directors, opened the floor.

Deep shocks to the psyche

From the editor's desk

The Rejectionist Palestinian Riots of 2000 brought with them a number of severe shocks to the Jewish world and to the Jewish psyche.

Some 10 weeks after the riots began, Jews, in Israel and in the Diaspora, are still deep in the throes of those shocks.

To try to better cope with them, we should identify what they are. To do that, let us recap some of the events and developments of the past 10 weeks.

• The timing of the riots. While the violence actually began in Gaza a week before the start of the Yamim Noraim, the orchestrated Temple Mount "eruption" occurred on the eve of Rosh Hashanah.

For most Jews, of course, this is a special time of year, a very serious time of year, more reflective, contemplative, introspective, a time when we speculate upon life's uncertainties and ponder specifically the unknowability of our own future. It is a time when we feel, in a certain sense, vulnerable.

It was during this time, when we were feeling most vulnerable, that the violence began, stirring, as it were, our individual feelings into a collective national mood.

• The "spontaneity" of the riots. From the very first moments of the riots, it was obvious that it had been planned, directed and maintained under the instructions of Yasser Arafat and his lieutenants. The stones had been gathered into piles on the Temple Mount; guns and automatic rifles had been distributed to the Tanzim; schools had been closed; the Palestinian media had begun delivering militant, martial messages well before Arik Sharon's "stroll" on the Temple Mount.

• Abuse of children. The celebrated use of children by the PA on the front lines and, conversely, the deliberate shootings aimed at Israeli schoolbuses or private vehicles carrying children has been simply shocking. The PA's goal was to ensure children on both sides would be killed.

• Jerusalem, but not for Jews. Virtually simultaneous with the rioting on the Temple Mount was the launching of a public campaign by PA leaders questioning the existences of the First and Second Temple and "warning" against the attempt by the Israelis to "Judaize Jerusalem." Thus the PA realigned the conflict. It was no longer against Israel but against the Jews; it was no longer against a competing territorial claim but now against Judaism itself.

• Muslim anti-Jewish intolerance. Muslim religious leaders have been among the most vitriolic and venomous inciters of hatred against the Jews of Israel. The fiercest rioting occurs regularly after Friday prayers.

• Worldwide, anti-Jewish intolerance. Like a callus that we hardly feel any longer but know is still there, Jews are not surprised by the occasional expressions of overt anti-Semitism. But the anti-Semitism that erupted around the world in the wake of the rioting, especially in the West, was truly shocking. And the incidents continue. The following was reported merely last week: Australian police defused a bomb that was found in a Sydney-area synagogue; about a dozen Jewish-owned stores in a suburb of Rome were vandalised; 17 gravestones were damaged in a Jewish cemetery in the German town of Saarbrucken; nearly all of the graves in the Jewish cemetery in the town of Lichtenburg, South Africa were damaged. That was only one week of reported incidents.

• The silence of the Christian world. Even acknowledging, for the sake of argument, the reluctance of the Church to support the justice of Israel's claim in the territorial aspect of the conflict, no Church leaders have commented upon, let alone condemned, the breathtakingly harsh, anti-Jewish nature of the conflict on the part of the Palestinians and their allies.

• The hypocrisy of the West. Western governments – including Canada, alas – have reverted to the same tired, dangerous, unhelpful Israel-bashing policies at the United Nations that characterized the nightmarish, morally-inverted days in the aftermath of the Yom Kippur War.

• The toll of the dead. All of the deaths, some 300 to date, were avoidable. The rioting need not have been ordered, need not have persisted, need not now continue. No one should have died.

Thus, given all that has happened since Rosh Hashanah, how could the Jewish psyche not be deeply shocked? We struggle to find answers to troubling, even numbing questions.

The first, and perhaps only true question, is: why? Why is the perpetuation of hatred seemingly embraced so much more enthusiastically by the Palestinian leadership than the attempt to foster understanding? Are the Palestinians irredeemably opposed to any Jewish state in the Middle East? If so, what was the point of the Oslo process? Was it simply a ruse by Arafat, as the Oslo opponents always said? Is there an alternative to a peace process with the Arafat-led Palestinians? Is there an alternative peace "partner" to Arafat? Can the two clashing cultures, societies, ways of life and sets of values ever be reconciled? Why, in the year 2000, do we still see and hear the same ignorant, malicious attitudes towards the Jews as were heard in medieval times?

Next week, thoughts on how we must try to cope with these shocks.

Cantorial concert held in support of Israel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It was a great night for singing, clapping, and solidarity.

Over 1,500 people participated in a community-wide synagogue cantorial concert at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue to demonstrate their commitment to Israel. Music and speeches shifted the mood from fear for Israel's current situation to hope for her future.

Chazzanim Yaakov Motzen and Shlomo Sufrin of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Efraim Sapir of Beth Tikvah Synagogue and Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple combined liturgical music with traditional Hebrew melodies which reflected the message of peace and love of Jerusalem and Israel.

Rabbi Moshe Shulman, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, said the concert was a rare opportunity to bring the Jewish community of Toronto together "to express our unwavering solidarity with and deep love for the State of Israel in an evening of music and song, music that uplifts the spirit and song that moves the soul.

"Tonight, we all put aside our differences, and we unite as one community, regardless of religious, denominational or communal affiliation.

"We join together because Israel belongs to all of us. And her survival depends on our ability and our willingness to stand united as one," he said.

Cantors Efraim Sapir, Benjamin Maissner, Yaakov Motzen and Shlomo Sufrin at the Synagogue Solidarity Concert for Israel. [Cynthia Gasner photo]

Consul General of Israel Meir Romem spoke of the "difficult times" for Israel, but he reassured the audience that "the people of Israel are strong – Israel as you know is a strong country, a viable country."

He added that "this wonderful demonstration strengthens and encourages us – it sends a message to the leaders of Israel and to the people of Israel. We shall do our best to achieve peace and to make Israel one of the best countries of the world."

Chazzan Sufrin's superb interpretation of two of Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach's songs, Im Eshkachech and Uv'neh, brought a standing ovation from the enthusiastic audience.

There were tears of joy for Chazzan Maissner's interpretation of Nomi Shemer's Songs of Peace.

There were tears of sadness as Chazzan Motzen spoke of the many Israeli soldiers who have lost their lives and dedicated composer Shaike Paikov's Achai Giborei T'hilah to them.

And there were tears of hope as Chazzan Sapir spoke of his experience as a young combat officer commanding a platoon of Druze soldiers during the war of 1967. "We thought that this would be the war to end war."

In 1973, he was called back from Omaha, Nebraska to serve in his unit in the Yom Kippur War. "Our yearning for no more war is never ending – we pray Lo Teda Milchama – Let this country know war no more." Sapir was joined by Maissner and Motzen to perform this wish for peace.

The three Israeli-born chazzanim, Maissner, Motzen and Sapir performed Jerusalem is Mine with great emotion and pride.

The four tenors not only harmonized together in a united prayer for peace, but they also demonstrated the camaraderie that exists between them despite their differing religious affiliations.

All in all, it was a memorable evening, from O Canada and Avinu Shebashamayim, a prayer for Israel composed by Sol Zim and performed by all the chazzanim, to the closing medley of 17 chassidic melodies and the singing of Hatikvah, where the audience joined in exuberantly.

Accompanying the chazzanim were Nadia Adler on piano, Shelley Miller on bass guitar and Ken Rabow on percussion.

Israel said using excessive force to suppress riots

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's security forces used excessive force to suppress recent Israeli Arab riots, claims the executive director of Rabbis for Human Rights.

In an interview last week, Rabbi Arik Ascherman, who is based in Israel, suggested that the Israeli government had overreacted to Israeli Arab protests.

Referring to the unrest in Israel's Arab community that claimed the lives of 13 Arabs, Rabbi Ascherman said, "Violent riots [could have been] dispersed by nonlethal means."

He expressed skepticism over Israel's claims that the police did not have sufficient riot control equipment to deal with protesters.

Rabbi Ascherman said he is awaiting the results of a judicial commission currently studying the Israeli Arab riots, the worst civil disturbances in Israel's history.

Turning to the Palestinian riots on the Temple Mount which developed into a full-blown uprising, he said Israel should have sealed off that compound instead of resorting to force.

The rioting might not have spun out of control after the first day and a half had the number of Palestinian injured been kept to a minimum, he observed.

Rabbi Ascherman, whose group claims to be the only Israeli rabbinic organization comprised of Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist and Orthodox rabbis, said he condemns violence on both sides as morally wrong and strategically counter-productive.

Rabbi Ascherman was here under the auspices of Canadian Council of Reform Judaism, ARZA Canada, Temple Anshe Sholom, Canadian Friends of Peace Now and Canadian Friends of Givat Haviva.

Rabbis for Human Rights was founded in 1988 in response to serious abuses of human rights by Israeli military authorities in the suppression of the first intifadah, which lasted from 1987 to 1993.

Rabbis for Human Rights maintains that the Israeli army has abused human rights under the guise of security.

A graduate of Harvard and a Reform rabbi himself, he criticized Israel for demolishing Palestinian homes and expropriating their lands and uprooting their fruit trees.

Rabbi Ascherman, 41, said the current Palestinian uprising is the result of pent-up frustration.

"The anger has been building for years. The situation was volatile."

The Palestinians, he added, did not believe there was a genuine peace process under way.

Rabbi Ascherman voiced regret that the gap between rich and poor in Israel has widened so much that it is now one of the biggest in the world.

"Economic justice is a human rights issue," Rabbi Ascherman said.

Saying that poverty is particularly prevalent in Israeli Arab communities, he claimed that the rioting there was led by young, unemployed youths lashing out at the system.

He said that Israel discriminates against its Arab citizens in almost every sphere, from infrastructure allocations to land confiscations.

Rabbi Ascherman, married to Einat Ramon, the first Israeli-born woman to be ordained as a rabbi, said he is guided by the philosophy of tikkun olam (repairing the world).

"We do what we do because it is the right thing to do and the Jewish thing to do.

"What we do is in the interest of Israel and the Jewish people. We need to build an Israel that survives not only physically but morally.

"As a Jew and a Zionist, I get no great pleasure from dealing with the darkest corners of Israeli society."

Arafat not willing to compromise: Doidge

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People living in the western world need to realize that Yasser Arafat will never compromise, says Norman Doidge, a psychiatrist and political commentator for the National Post.

"Living in a democracy, we think that anything can be split and shared.

"Arafat, however, has a long history of saying one thing and doing another," said Doidge, head of long-term psychology for the department of psychiatry, University of Toronto.

He was the second speaker in a three-part series on the crisis in the Middle East, sponsored by ARZA Canada and the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning at Holy Blossom Temple.

All subjects in Palestinian schools, he said, are used to admire martyrs, and "they learn that jihad is the religious duty of every Muslim – Jews must be killed.

"This is anti-Semitism as raw as it comes to bear. [We hear] words as chillingly genocidal as anything in Mein Kampf," he said.

It is frightening for North American Jews to think that Israel's troubles are driven by anti-Semitism, he said, "because that means some of that hatred is directed at us."

We are told in the media that Arabs want peace, said Doidge, "but it is not true. Surveys have shown that Arabs support Islamic attacks on Israel, and Egyptian studies have shown that educated Egyptians are more opposed [than others] to peace with Israel."

Israelis have rediscovered "reluctantly that the Palestinian leader has ambitions that include the destruction of Israel," he said.

Anti-Semites claim that Jews invented systems of oppression such as Zionism and Marxism, said Doidge. "These thoughts are unconsciously projected on [others around them.]

"This anti-Semitic language then gets displaced to Israel. Anti-Semites get worked up about the faults of Israel; [sometimes even] whole synagogues become full of Jewish anti-Semites.

"People have internalized Arab propaganda and fall under the sway of psychological forces. This is called Jewish self-hate. It begins when Jews begin to feel that anti-Semites are accurate.

> Anti-Semitism directed at Israel

"When children are constantly criticized by their parents they begin to internalize, and start thinking that the rejections are just. An innocent child is turned into the devil. This is unconscious projection – how we learn to take in the influences around us."

Even adults, he said, identify with aggressors under supreme pressure. "Terrorism crosses psychological borders. People abducted by terrorists often praise their captors because unconsciously, they depend on them for their next breath. They have mentally turned fear into love."

We have underestimated the influence that anti-Semitism has had on us, said Doidge, because "a lot of anti-Semitism has been displaced on Israel. Israelis are under tremendous pressure. This has been going on since the beginning of time."

What we need, he said, is an articulate Israeli corps who is ready to speak the truth. "Israel wants a durable peace, and we have to campaign for American support."

CJN hosts chess challenge

TORONTO — Calling all chess players from kindergarten to Grade 12.

The Canadian Jewish News is hosting its first regional chess challenge, under the direction of the Chess 'N Math Association, on Jan. 28.

Players can be at a basic or a competitive level, and competitive players at each age group can move on to a provincial competition.

"We're trying to make young people more aware of our newspaper, and we want to support youth activity," says Janice Atkinson, circulation/promotion manager for The CJN.

It is a chance for basic players to test their skills and learn more about the game, and a chance for more experienced players to be challenged, she says.

Larry Bevin, of the Chess 'N Math Association, will bring the necessary equipment, provide the referees and do all the rankings and pairing. Light kosher refreshments will be provided.

Registration for the tournament, being held at the Kamin Education Centre of Associated Hebrew Schools, 300 Atkinson Ave., is from 12:45 to 1:15 p.m. Entry fee is $6 pre-registered and $8 at the door. - C.B.

¡Alegria! celebrates Sephardi culture

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL, ONT. — Saffron, cumin and turmeric were not the only elements adding spice to a recent event at the Sephardic Kehila Centre.

¡Alegria!, a joint project of State of Israel Bonds women's division and the synagogue's women's auxiliary, was an evening featuring Sephardi song and dance, food, and a display of artifacts including a gold-tasseled henna carriage used to carry a bride into her traditional henna party on the night before her wedding.

Participants at last week's event were invited to "celebrate the joy of Sephardic culture," an allusion to the word alegria, which is Spanish for joy.

The event was an "extraordinary gathering," said Ora Stolovitz, North American Women's Division vice-chair for Canada.

Rabbi Amram Assayag, who addressed the group at the beginning of the evening, noted the significance of the date. Dec. 5 was the anniversary of the 1496 edict expelling Portugal's Jews, some of whom had fled there four years earlier, after being expelled from Spain.

The recent gathering of 350 women in the three-year-old synagogue whose ark is a replica of one in Toledo, Spain, and whose other architectural features are also modelled on Sephardi synagogues, was proof that "we were able to take all the richness we had...and rebuild from country to country the beauty of our past," said the rabbi.

Sephardi Jews who made their home in Morocco for generations after the expulsion, left in large numbers after the Six Day War, he noted. "We came to Canada with very little."

Despite a fear that they might "disappear," Moroccan immigrants found "a warm Jewish community that we knew little about. There were many differences between Ashkenazic and Sephardic Jews, and an initial language barrier made it hard to communicate," Rabbi Assayag said.

At ¡Alegria!, co-chaired by Luna Igelman and Vivien Sharon, Ashkenazi women mingled with their Sephardi counterparts, some of whom added a touch of visual spice with their traditional caftans.

Ethnomusicologist Judith Cohen and her daughter Tamar Cohen Adams, 14, accompanied themselves on a variety of traditional instruments as they sang Judeo-Spanish and Sephardi songs representing a range of life-cycle events.

Sephardi dancer Dahlia Obadia, and Charly and Simon Sibony, Judeo-Moroccan and Moroccan-Andalusian singers and chazzanim, also performed.

Admission to the event required a minimum purchase of a $136 "Chai" bond through Bonds' women's division. Renette Berman, women's division chair, noted in her speech that "the bond you bought to attend this event is already being used to...make Israel stronger."

The partnership between Bonds and the synagogue seemed "very natural," said Rabbi Assayag, "in the way we feel about our commitment towards Eretz Yisrael.

By their own hands, the vicious cycle spins

Last Friday, as noontime prayers came to an end in the Palestinian-controlled territories, worshippers poured out of their mosques with hatred high in their hearts and the instruction to perpetrate a "day of rage" still pounding in their ears. As evening settled upon the battered land, 10 more people, three of them Israelis, had been killed, victims of the Palestinian leaders' ongoing, perfidious betrayal of peace and of their own people. The total number of people killed by the Palestinian rioting since Sept. 28, has now exceeded 300.

Earlier in the week, the United Nations issued a report stating that the rate of unemployment among Palestinians had more than tripled since September from 12 to 40 percent. The report noted that the steep increase in the rate of unemployment was due to the fact that Israel had closed its borders to the Palestinians from the territories after the rioting broke out in September. Not only were Palestinians not permitted to enter Israel to work, the report added, but in some cases they were not permitted to leave their own communities. It concluded by noting that a return to negotiations could only be achieved by "a radical improvement in the living conditions of the people on the ground."

The logic of the report is a tautological absurdity. The Palestinians are caught, the report suggested, in the suffocating centrifuge of a vicious cycle. They riot because of their suffering; they suffer because of high unemployment; but the high unemployment would be relieved if only Israel would allow them back to work at their old jobs!

It is true the Palestinians are caught in a nasty, vicious cycle of despair and violence. But it is a cycle spun for them by their own leaders' hands. It is the rioting that has caused the closure of the borders that has caused high Palestinian unemployment that has caused Palestinian suffering. Thus it is PA leadership, not Israeli, that has the power to immediately and meaningfully relieve the suffering of the Palestinian people by calling a complete, permanent halt to the rioting.

Into the very midst of the vertiginous centrifuge of this ever-spinning cycle of Palestinian violence has now been thrust the Israeli political system. The resignation of Ehud Barak; the attempted triumphal return of Benjamin Netanyahu and the in-limbo status of Ariel Sharon are suddenly new, complicated "spanners" in an already gummed-up government works. One thing is certain: elections must be held in Israel within 60 days. The question remains, as of this writing however, whether Israelis will be voting only for a new prime minister, or for a new prime minister and a new Knesset, and, of course, who will be the candidates?

Whatever the outcome of the elections, may they help bring about a speedy and peaceful end to the destructive and deathly cycle of violence.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Saddam's ironic generosity

There is a terrible irony that while the butcher of Baghdad, Saddam Hussein, is giving $10,000 (US) to the families of Palestinians killed in the current Middle East turmoil, hundreds of children in Iraq are starving to death because of his refusal to allow in arms inspectors.

Is it any wonder that Israelis are becoming more and more suspicious of the viability of peace with their Palestinian neighbours who are calling for Saddam to bomb Tel Aviv? The deaths of both Israelis and Palestinians are deplorable; however, Yasser Arafat, with his 50,000 armed soldiers could, if he wanted to, easily suppress the armed militants and order Palestinian children back to their schools, thereby ending the confrontation.

The Palestinians are throwing away the best opportunity in decades for peace and statehood and they have only themselves to blame.

It's Time to Voice Disapproval

I was utterly amazed to see the Nov. 30 article where the Canada Israel Committee (CIC) actually criticizes the National Post for its review of Canada's UN voting pattern on matters concerning Israel.

It's time for Jews in Canada to voice their resounding disapproval of Canada's UN record on Israel. Since we meekly chose not to demonstrate our displeasure at the ballot box in the recent election, the least we can do now is be much more vocal with the Liberal government. If Canadian Jewish organizations cannot or will not stand up and ensure that Canada's "routine" UN voting pattern changes, then the organizations may as well be, and perhaps already are, as "perfunctory" as the UN votes Canada has supported.

Trudeau was indeed a friend

I take exception to Alex Shnerer's comment (Letter to the editor, Nov. 16) that the late Pierre Elliott Trudeau was not a friend of the Jewish people.

While it is historically accurate that Canada, under Liberal prime minister Mackenzie King, refused Jewish refugees a safe haven, allowing some Nazis and fascists entrance instead, many Jewish refugees were allowed refuge under former and subsequent Liberal governments. My parents and grandparents were refugees under Liberal Wilfred Laurier in 1910.

Pierre Elliott Trudeau was also the only prime minister to appoint a Jew, the late Bora Laskin in 1970, to the Supreme Court of Canada (four months later, Trudeau elevated him to the position of Chief Justice). In 1982, Trudeau repatriated our Canadian Constitution, transferring power to the people of Canada, thus entrenching the rights of individual citizens. The late Pierre Elliott Trudeau was a great Canadian and humanist and has made our country a better place for Christians and Jews alike.

Jewry should not push Israel

It never ceases to amaze me that no matter how much evidence there is that Israel is doing what it must do – what any democratic nation in a similar situation would do – there is a faction within the Jewish people that is willing to break ranks with Israel and call upon the Jewish people to force Israel's hand.

In a letter to the editor (Dec. 7), Ira Zbarsky asks us to push Israel to stop defending its citizens and outposts. He refers to the Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International and the UN Commission as "the most respected international human rights organizations" despite the unbalanced approach of these organizations to Israel.

World Jewry should not be pushing Israel to follow biased resolutions; rather, it should push governments to treat Israel more fairly.

Who will be left to use the money?

Re: Ron Csillag's article (Nov. 20) on the restitution for Holocaust survivors. According to numerous previous reports, some funds should have reached survivors by Nov. 20. Now, there is no date being mentioned any longer, just delays. Different organizations are trying to be involved in the process which will only add to the delay.

Most of the survivors are in their late seventies and by the time funds become available, there will be no one left to enjoy the extra money.

Separating conjoined twins: Halachic considerations

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ
Special to the CJN

'Propriety of sacrificing one life for the sake of saving many others'

In August 2000, conjoined twins Jodie and Mary were born. After the birth, it became clear that if they remained together they would die. Operating to separate them would result in the certain death of Mary, but would give Jodie a reasonable chance at life. Their parents, devout Catholics, refused to allow their children to be separated, accepting it as God's will that the babies would die.

In September, a British court overruled the objections of the parents and ordered that the operation be performed. On Nov. 6, Jodie and Mary were surgically separated, and Mary died on the operating table.

This is not the first time this difficult moral dilemma has occurred. In September 1977, conjoined twins were born to a prominent rabbinic family in Lakewood, N.J. The children were taken to Children's Hospital in Philadelphia, where Dr. C. Everett Koop (who would later become surgeon general of the United States) was set to operate on them.

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein

In this case as well, if the operation was to be performed, the life of the weaker child would have to be sacrificed.

The parents turned to Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, a highly respected halachic authority, to render a decision. After two weeks of deliberations and repeated consultations with the medical staff, Rabbi Feinstein gave a ruling allowing the operation.

Even though many on the medical team had become impatient waiting for Rabbi Feinstein's ruling, Dr. Koop told them that "the ethics and morals involved in this decision are too complex for me... therefore, I referred it to an old rabbi in New York. He is a great scholar, a saintly individual; he knows how to answer such questions."

Rabbi Moshe Tendler

Sacrifice and Self-Defence

Although Rabbi Feinstein never published a responsum explaining his decision, two recent articles report and reconstruct the reasoning behind this ruling (Rabbi Moshe David Tendler, Rabbi Feinstein's son-in-law, Responsa of Rav Moshe Feinstein: Translation and Commentary (Ktav: Hoboken, 1996), pages 125-135; J. David Bleich, Tradition, Fall 1996, pages 92-125).

There are two primary issues in deciding this question. One is the propriety of sacrificing one life for the sake of saving many others, and the second is how one defines the concept of self-defence.

The Talmud establishes that one may not commit murder for self preservation. If a person is threatened that if he does not kill another person, he himself will be killed, he must allow himself to be killed.

The Talmud explains that all lives have equal value, and says, "how do you know your blood is redder than his; maybe his blood is redder than yours." By killing in order to save his own life, the killer has acted immorally – he has placed his own life on a higher level than the victim's.

But what if by killing one person many lives would be saved? Some say murder is absolutely forbidden, even for the sake of saving many lives (Rambam and Keseph Mishnah Yesodei 5:5; cf. Chidushei Rav Chaim Halevi 5:1).

Others argue that under certain circumstances, you may decide on pragmatic grounds to sacrifice one life to save the lives of many. They believe that in a case where the aggressors are pursuing a particular person they have selected to die and that this particular person would die anyway after the aggressors attacked, one may turn over the selected person in order to save the lives of other people (Rashi Sanhedrin 72b s.v. Yatza Rosho; cf. Meiri who limits the application of this principle).

This difference of opinion is of great relevance to the case of conjoined twins. If both Jodie and Mary will die without the operation, but Jodie could survive with the operation, it is as though Mary, the weaker child, has been "selected" for death, because she is certain to die. One could argue that Rashi, who permits turning over the selected individual to the aggressor, would allow the surgeons to perform the surgery. However, the Rambam, who on principle opposes killing one to save many, would oppose this operation. Rabbi Tendler reports that Rabbi Feinstein refused to rely on Rashi's opinion, because he did not want to rely on a disputed opinion in a life and death case.

Rabbi Ben-Zion Meir Hai Uziel

The Law of the Rodeph

Rabbi Feinstein finally decided the case based on the law of the pursuer (or rodeph). The Torah allows a person to use lethal force, if necessary, to defend his life. In addition, an outsider observing the altercation has an obligation to use lethal force in order to save the life of the victim.

The Talmud says that even if the aggressor is too young to understand his actions, he is still considered a rodeph. However, there is an important exception. In childbirth, where the baby's head has exited the birth canal (making it a full born human), but the difficulty of the subsequent labour is endangering the lives of both mother and child, the child is not in any way considered a rodeph. The Talmud (Sanhedrin 72b) says the reason why the child is not considered a rodeph is because "from heaven she is being pursued."

This statement leaves itself open to interpretation. Rabbi Ben-Zion Uziel (Piskei Uziel 51) understands the Talmud as saying that since childbirth is a natural act, the baby is not a rodeph. A person who is endangering another person's life due to an act of God cannot be considered a rodeph.

However, Rabbi Feinstein (Cf. Even Haezel 1:9; Iggrot Moshe YD II:60) gives this section a different interpretation. He said that this phrase has to be interpreted according to the Jerusalem Talmud. In the Jerusalem Talmud, the reason why the baby and mother are left alone during childbirth is because they are both considered to be mutual antagonists, two people who are both pursuing each other, and therefore neither has the status of rodeph. According to the Jerusalem Talmud, if two people are fighting a duel, neither is considered a rodeph, because the threat is mutual; so too, the mother and child are endangering each other's lives, and therefore neither can be considered a rodeph.

Can the weaker twin, Mary, be considered a rodeph? This depends on which interpretation is chosen. If you maintain that natural circumstances cannot categorize someone as a rodeph, then there is no way Mary can be considered a rodeph. Her presence as one of the conjoined twins is merely an act of God. Following Rabbi Ben Uziel's logic, then, Mary is not a rodeph, and it would be forbidden to separate conjoined twins when one would certainly die.

However, if you maintain that what exempts a child during labour from being considered a rodeph is the mutuality of threat, you can argue that since by their continued attachment, Mary is threatening Jodie's life but Jodie is not threatening Mary's life, Mary can be considered a rodeph. There is no mutual threat and Mary is the singular cause of this danger. Her life is not viable, with or without the operation. Because Mary is a rodeph, then, it is permissible to perform the operation that resulted in her death. Similarly, in the Lakewood case, where one baby could clearly be defined as the rodeph, Rabbi Feinstein allowed the operation to proceed.

It is overwhelming for a human being to decide who shall live and who shall die. However, there are times when these decisions must be made. With his courageous decision, Rabbi Feinstein found a way to follow Halachah and save a baby's life.

Mastering the world

In these columns, I have made repeated references to ecology as a religious obligation.

In the Book of Genesis (1:28) humanity is given permission to utilize (literally "master") the earth's resources to the fullest, but tradition has made it clear that this is not a licence to abuse them. For "the earth is the Lord's with all that it holds," says the Book of Psalms (24:1). And God reminds His creatures that they must operate within certain laws – for their own benefit as well as that of nature.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The Torah has no literal equivalent of the term "ecology," though the interdependence of creation and humanity and the dependence of both on God are an essential part of its world view.

There is, for instance, the institution of the sabbatical year. Farmers were to let the fields lie fallow so that they might recuperate (Leviticus, chapter 25). Called shemitah, this long neglected practice is, today, the subject of heated controversy.

There is further a passage in Deuteronomy (20:19-20) which says the following: "When in your war against a city you have to besiege it a long time in order to capture it, you must not destroy its trees, wielding the axe against them. You may eat of them but must not cut them down. Are trees of the field human to withdraw before you into the besieged city?"

Based on these principles, the rabbis expanded human responsibilities for the proper uses of nature and created a whole category of actions that fell under the prohibition of wastefulness, which they called bal tashchit.

They ruled, for instance, that by extension, the law against cutting down a fruit tree also forbade the drawing of its sap for the sake of destruction, and thus defoliation of such trees – not uncommon in modern warfare – would also be considered contrary to the spirit of the law.

As the Jewish saying goes, when a tree is cut down, its voice of pain resounds throughout the world. While the word "ecology" was not known to our ancestors, the principle certainly was and observing it in our personal lives is carrying out an important religious obligation.

So, what can we do about it? The important thing is to remember that our own individual behaviour plays a role in upholding ecological cautions.

Recycling rather than thoughtless dumping of used materials is a beginning; turning off the water when you do not need it is another. There are dozens of other opportunities, and supporting organizations like Pollution Probe is a further example. It always is essential to remember that mastering the world is a privilege we must not abuse.

Israeli news program struggles to survive

Two weeks ago, Israel's only English-language daily television newscast, IBA News, celebrated its 10th anniversary. It came at a time when TV journalists, especially in the foreign media, were making headlines themselves due to their controversial coverage of the current conflict with the Palestinians.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Since the advent of cable television, people in Israel have become accustomed to seeing their reality through the eyes of foreign correspondents. Reports from Jerusalem and Tel Aviv on CNN, BBC and SKY are watched by countless Israelis, often aghast at what they see by way of frequently misleading, overly-simplified, pro-Palestinian content.

For those in Israel with little command of Hebrew, but eager for local reporting, IBA News plays a vital role. As the sole TV program in English presenting the news from an Israeli perspective, it provides a valuable service for diplomats, tourists, visiting professionals and business people, foreign journalists and new immigrants.

Such a program would seem to fulfil an obvious need, particularly in a country forever lamenting its poor international image and its failure to better influence public opinion abroad. Sadly, even after 10 years, IBA News is still understaffed, ill-equipped and terribly under-financed. This despite having proven itself as a lively, informative, highly reliable source of Israeli news watched even in some Arab countries. Millions of people outside the region also see IBA News material often broadcast on CNN's World Report program.

Before I continue singing the praises of IBA News, I should own up to my lack of objectivity. As a senior editor/reporter on the program since 1992, I may be partial but I'm not blind to its value to Israel.

Although it is broadcast on Israel Television, the state-run channel, IBA News is anything but a public relations arm of the government. Operating according to the highest professional ethics and journalistic criteria, it is fiercely independent in choosing its content.

Free of outside pressure, IBA News also features interviews with left-wing and right-wing politicians and activists, both Jewish and Arab. Yet ironically, even as one of Israel's best resources in the public information battle for foreign understanding, it is still struggling to survive.

IBA News (the initials stand for Israel Broadcasting Authority, the local equivalent of the CBC) is shown on the country's public network, Channel One. Although existing on a relatively meager budget, IBA News almost perished in the past as part of previous cost-cutting measures. At the time, the head of Israel Television said that with easy access to CNN, there was no more need to "waste" resources on an English-language Israeli news show.

If there's one thing never lacking in Israel, it's hard news, controversy and strident public debate – most of which does not appear on CNN. The multitude of major events and the intensity with which they unfold here is staggering.

This is what IBA News is all about seven evenings a week, 12 months a year for some 125,000 people each day in Israel (not including viewers in Jordan, Egypt, Lebanon and Syria.) That's the equivalent of 650,000 viewers in Canada. To its credit, IBA News contrasts sharply with the English-language newscasts in the Palestinian Authority and neighbouring countries that are little more than unadulterated propaganda vehicles – rife with vile anti-Semitic incitement – masquerading as journalism.

Nobody likes a good fight more than the news media and the Palestinian uprising has provided journalists with a treasure of action-packed material – usually to the detriment of Israel's international standing.

Daily scenes of Israeli soldiers facing off against Palestinian gunmen and angry mobs (including children) throwing rocks and firebombs make for gripping television if not necessarily a better understanding of what's behind the violence.

Israelis have long ago given up expecting a fair shake from many foreign correspondents when it comes to the Palestinian question. Too often, in both obvious and subliminal ways, their reports betray a bias against Israel, portraying it as the mighty, mean and menacing Goliath against the virtuous, defenseless David (the Palestinians).

In the face of such chronic media distortion and Arab misinformation, Israel must re-examine its own efforts to tell its side of the story more effectively. All the more reason the country should better support its one and only English language TV newscast.

The decline of Ehud Barak

In May 1999, former IDF Chief of Staff Ehud Barak who then became head of the Labour Party, won an overwhelming election victory, defeating Benjamin Netanyahu by over 10 percent.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Eighteen months later, amidst an ongoing war, this relationship has been reversed, and Barak trails Netanyahu by over 20 points in the polls. Reflecting on this situation, the Knesset voted to bring the Barak government to an end and to hold new elections.

While this was only the first of three rounds (three separate votes are necessary), and the decision might still be reversed, these developments reflect the precipitous decline in Barak's standing.

Israeli politics have a long history of negative voting. In 1996, Netanyahu was elected because he was not Peres, and three years later, Barak was elected as a reaction to the divisiveness of Netanyahu.

In the campaign, Barak created "One Israel," which was designed to widen and renew the ossified Labour party, and after the election, he reiterated the pledges to reach comprehensive peace agreements within a year, withdraw from Lebanon, and also repair the damaged Israeli social fabric.

However, the election promises soon faded. Barak surrounded himself with yes-men that came from the same narrow military background, and he excluded coalition members and ministers from discussions of vital issues.

Even the core members of his own party, including Justice Minister Yossi Beilin, and Knesset Speaker Avrum Burg were kept away.

This one-man style of government was reflected in the substantive failures. Ignoring advice from many sources, he misjudged the negotiation processes with Syria and with the Palestinians, and made major mistakes in dealing with Washington.

The stubborn refusal to cancel the sale of a military aircraft to China was particularly damaging, and eventually, Barak was forced to abandon it. After withdrawing from Lebanon, Barak suddenly discovered that the United Nations peacekeeping force that he expected was not coming.

The Camp David summit in July marked the beginning of the end. Barak ignored outside experts who recognized that regardless of the concessions on the Israeli side, Arafat had not created the foundation for Palestinian concessions or for an agreement recognizing the legitimacy of Israel.

Barak pressed ahead, offering concessions on Jerusalem, territory, the dismantling of Jewish communities, and the "right of return" claimed for Palestinian refugees, but got nothing in return.

At this stage, the remaining coalition partners walked out (most had already reeognized that this government was not really interested in a partnership or creating consensus). Had Barak managed to return with a clear agreement to the end the conflict, this might have been enough to gain a narrow victory in elections or a referendum. However, he came home with nothing except the Palestinian preparations for war and terrorism, which erupted on the day before Rosh Hashanah.

Since then, Barak has attempted to manage the military response, putting pressure on the Palestinians to end the violence, while also avoiding escalation leading to a regional war. Here, he is doing somewhat better than as a political leader. However, Barak also appears to be politically and psychologically glued to the hope that the Oslo process can still be pursued, despite Arafat's betrayal and terrorism of the past two months.

For a large part of the Israeli electorate, Ehud Barak is dangerously out of touch with reality.

At the same time, rationally, the last thing Israel needs now is another round of elections. Under current conditions, a bitter and partisan political campaign, (the third in five years) that will only increase the deep divisions among Israelis, appears totally irresponsible.

Israel faces difficult and momentous decisions, and one way or another, a national unity government is the most likely outcome. A broad political leadership will bring the diverse perspectives together to jointly tackle these threats.

The Kirshner File

Israel's armed forces, then and now

From humble beginnings, the Israel Defence Force has grown into a formidable military machine, the strongest in the Middle East. Yet in the increasingly bitter clash with the Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, the IDF is confronted by stone-throwing protesters and armed guerrillas against whom its enormous advantage in technology is not necessarily a decisive factor.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The IDF, whose antecedents are rooted in the early 20th century, is fighting a battle in which tanks and heavy artillery do not make much of an appreciable difference. It is as if the IDF has been thrown back to the simpler era of Ha-Shomer, founded in 1905 by new Russian Jewish immigrants as the first organized armed group in the Yishuv.

Disbanded in 1920, Ha-Shomer was replaced by the Haganah, which was far more sophisticated. Aligned with rival Jewish formations, Etsel, Lechi and Palmach, the Haganah boldly confronted Arab armies that attacked the newly-formed State of Israel in 1948.

Jewish forces, though highly motivated, were ill-organized, poorly trained and initially outnumbered in that war, writes Hebrew University historian Martin van Creveld in The Sword and the Olive (Public Affairs), an exhaustive history of the IDF. Toward the close, however, Israel had almost 90,000 men and women under arms, and the Arabs had 68,000.

Although Israel prevailed and expanded its claustrophobic borders, the war was catastrophic in terms of casualties, claiming 5,682 soldiers, a figure that was never been equalled in any of Israel's subsequent wars.

In the early years of statehood, the IDF performed two primary tasks, the first of which was mounting retaliatory raids across Arab borders. Denying responsibility for these reprisals, Israel switched course and eventually took credit for them. The IDF was also engaged in nation-building through its array of educational and land-settling programs.

Militarily, the 1956 Sinai war was a success, but as van Creveld observes, the IDF was unable to translate victories in the field into solid political achievements. It was a problem that would haunt Israel.

The 1960s were important years in the IDF's evolution as a crack fighting force, van Creveld notes. Israel upgraded its air force, the key to its success in the Six Day War, and with Ezer Weizman at its helm, Israel retired its last remaining piston-engine combat aircraft and purchased supersonic Mysteres, Super Mysteres and Mirage jets from France.

Van Creveld believes that the Six Day War transformed Israel's strategic situation, making its borders much easier to defend. But, he says, the occupation of the Sinai, West Bank, Gaza Strip and Golan Heights was a transformative event, turning Israel into an occupying power, with all its corrupting moral and political excesses.

In van Creveld's judgment, the prestige of the IDF reached its zenith from 1967 to 1973, when new, potent American weapon systems – such as F-4 Phantom fighter-bombers, M-60 tanks and Cobra helicopters – were integrated into its armoury.

Despite its gradual modernization, the IDF was still weighed down by virtually obsolete equipment: World War II-vintage Sherman tanks and M-3 half-tracks. In addition, there was a shortage of ground-to-air missiles and air-to-ground missiles.

During this period, the IDF modified its strategic doctrine. Under the leadership of Chief of Staff Chaim Bar-Lev, who would go on to be a cabinet minister and an ambassador, the offensive-minded IDF adopted a defensive orientation.

This shift occurred as the dust of the Six Day War settled and as Egypt launched an increasingly costly war of attrition against Israel in the Sinai.

As the IDF struggled to cope with Egyptian artillery barrages, commando raids and air attacks, which exacted a fearsome toll on its soldiers, Israeli generals debated on the best way of defending the Sinai.

One school, spearheaded by Israel Tal and Ariel Sharon, argued in favour of a fluid strategy – launching counter-offensives from bases in the rear, away from the Suez Canal and out of Egyptian gun range. The second school, led by Bar-Lev, called for a system of fortified strongholds along the length of the canal, which was closed to shipping during and after the Six Day War. Bar-Lev prevailed.

Despite all the punishing land and air operations the IDF mounted to deter the Egyptians from probing and destroying its positions, Israel failed to break Egypt's will in this war.

And, as van Creveld points out, Israel also found itself battling Egypt's ally, the Soviet Union. In July 1970, just a month before a ceasefire finally ended the "war after the war," as it was sometimes called, Israeli planes downed five MiGS flown by Soviet pilots.

As the second Palestinian uprising rages, Israeli soldiers scuffle with a member of the Palestinian Authority's police force. [RNS]

Yet this was not the sole encounter between Israelis and Soviets. As the weeks dragged on, Israeli aviators found it increasingly difficult to penetrate and knock out Egyptian anti-aircraft missile batteries in the Western Desert manned by Soviet personnel.

In van Creveld's view, the 1973 Yom Kippur War, a jolt to Israel's solar plexus, awakened Israel to the reality that it could not occupy Arab lands with impunity.

The first three days of the war, during which the Israelis lost almost 100 aircraft and chunks of territory to advancing Egyptian and Syrian forces in the Sinai and the Golan, were probably the darkest for Israel.

Although Israel eventually regained the initiative, the Arabs fought considerably better than in previous conflicts. And Israeli casualties were frighteningly high: 2,800 killed and 8,300 wounded, compared to 980 and 4,500 in 1967, and 190 and 900 in 1956.

By van Creveld's calculations, the average number of Israeli dead amounted to about 100 per day, compared to 15 during the much longer War of Independence.

Analyzing the 1982 Lebanon War, Israel's most problematic in terms of conception and results, van Creveld says that the IDF's performance varied according to the adversary.

The IDF performed magnificently against Syria's air force and missile batteries, destroying its anti-aircraft system in Lebanon and shooting down one-fifth of its planes. Israeli armour, too, acquitted itself well in spite of one major failure. Yet the Israeli Air Force's ability to influence events on the ground was ultimately limited due to the nature of the terrain.

PLO formations were quickly scattered, but in western Lebanon Israeli armoured columns were all but irrelevant against guerrilla fighters.

Van Creveld says that the first Palestinian uprising in the territories (the intifadah) sucked the IDF into "moral dilemmas" with which it could not cope.

As a result of the breakdown of the Oslo peace process, the IDF today is embroiled in what amounts to a limited war with the Palestinian Authority. It is a far cry from the days when Israel and the PA were negotiating the details of a peace agreement.

The IDF, which pulled out of southern Lebanon unilaterally last May, is now engaged in a low-intensity war that could well spin out of control and assume disastrous regional proportions. Neither side, however, is winning it. As Prime Minister Ehud Barak said last week, "There is no solution which is purely military."

Jewish leadership: Canadian vs. American

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It seems Canada's up-and-coming Jewish community leaders differ significantly from their American counterparts.

The contrasts became apparent to some of those leaders over the past two years when the American-based Wexner Heritage Foundation brought its program of intensive Jewish study to Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver.

For Pam Medjuck Stein, 43, who completed the invitation-only program this summer with about 80 counterparts from the three Canadian cities (Toronto having had two groups of 20), the day school issue was a striking marker of the difference between Canadian and American Jewish leaders.

Guidy Mamann

Julia Reitman

At least in Toronto, the vast majority of participants had children in day school, she noted. Among the Americans, even those from larger cities, a minority were day school parents.

"For them, it's 'Should we have a day school?' For us, it's a non-issue," said Medjuck Stein, a past chair of the board of the Toronto Heschel School who gave up her arts law practice to be home with her four children.

There may be a shift taking place in the United States, however, according to Louise Stoll, executive vice-president and chief operating officer of United Jewish Communities, the umbrella for North American Jewish federations.

Speaking at a session at the recent General Assembly held in Chicago for North American Jewish leaders, Stoll said that while public school may have been good for the immigrant generation, it "may not be so great for the continuity generation."

Rabbi Nathan Laufer, president of the Wexner Heritage Foundation, said in a phone interview from his New York office that Canadian Jews, particularly in cities like Montreal and Toronto, are "culturally more conservative than in the United States. What we found were people's cultural values are 15 years or so behind the U.S."

The comment – based on criteria like "people's sense of family," going away to school or staying in one's hometown, and the role of women in synagogue services – was "descriptive" rather than "pejorative," he added.

Pam Medjuck Stein

Rabbi Laufer also found that, in Toronto particularly, participants were better educated, both Jewishly and secularly, than the Americans. "They had higher standards for themselves and for us, not intellectually so much but in terms of what their expectations were."

To accommodate some differences, a session on Canadian Jewry was instituted in this country as part of the Wexner program.

The program, geared for young leaders age 30 to 45, was the brainchild in the early 1980s of Leslie Wexner, founder of The Limited chain of clothing stores. The Wexner Heritage Foundation underwrites the cost of the program and boasts an elite faculty.

Toronto participant Guidy Mamann, 39 – an immigration lawyer and board member of both UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services – wasn't interested in the program initially, but the application piqued his interest with questions he'd never even asked himself.

Now, he says, he has a much better understanding of what a Jewish purpose is in life, and what his responsibilities are as a Jewish leader.

The program is not about leadership training, he noted, but about how to lead in a Jewish way. "I think all of us have looked at our own agencies and started to question whether we are delivering service in a Jewish way, in a way that does justice to the things that we learned."

Medjuck Stein, a Halifax native who attended afternoon Hebrew school and Canadian Young Judaea youth group and overnight camp, said the Wexner program was empowering and confidence-building. "If you know who you are as a person and a Jewish person, then that helps you frame the workload you take on."

Fellow participant Julia Reitman of Montreal has gained a "great appreciation" for religious diversity within Judaism as well as increased commitment and increased understanding of the value of education, she said in a recent phone interview.

Reitman, a 47-year-old mother of three, is on the board of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom and is co-chair of its education committee.

She is in touch with ex-Wexner participants, and there is talk of doing a joint project, perhaps a round table. "The more interaction and communication we have, the stronger we will be."

Kabbalah teacher shares his spiritual teachings

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews don't need New Age or Eastern wisdom to understand the purpose of life and the nature of human beings, asserts Rabbi Laibl Wolf.

"The teachings of the Torah and of Chassidism can bring [those issues] into clear focus," he told The CJN.

Rabbi Wolf is a lawyer, educational psychologist, and a teacher of Kabbalah and chassidic spiritual ways. He lectures, conducts retreats, and counsels families.

He is the founder and director of the Human Development Institute in Australia.

The rabbi was in Toronto recently as scholar-in-residence at Pride of Israel Synagogue.

He lamented the fact that "many Jews want to express themselves as Jews, but shuls and temples have put them off." This leads them to search for truth and meaning in other places than traditional Judaism.

"Many know more about Deepak Chopra [an Indian mystic] than about the Baal Shem Tov [the founder of Chassidism]," he said.

In his retreats and classes, he said, he tries to "integrate chassidic insights with contemporary research."

'Integrate chassidic insights with contemporary research'

For instance, the Rambam says that people are not allowed to express anger under any circumstances, but he doesn't say how to manage that. "That isn't his purpose," Rabbi Wolf noted.

What he himself does, he said, is to train people to observe the way the mind and the heart work by teaching them the spiritual energies that are their bases.

Changing the way you think and feel, leads to "an interpretation of life, and [the ability] to express their emotions."

For example, anger is prevalent in western society, Rabbi Wolf mused, citing road rage as an example. "Just think – if we can solve this human [failing], how much we will be able to improve human society."

Anger, he said, comes from fear. "It is a way of expressing insecurities." People have to realize that showing anger is not the way to get what you want. You must empathize with the other person's insecurities."

He insists that his approach is a very practical one. He is not in favour of the current trend to study Kabbalah, calling it "a waste of time."

"It is best to study the chassidic teachings, which explain things in a profound way."

After one of his lectures or retreats, the rabbi said, he is "pleasantly surprised by the numbers who walk away saying that they found a spiritual dimension that speaks to them."

He introduces "contemplative and meditative aspects to the shul service," he explained. "I teach the depths of meanings of the words of the prayers in a spiritual context, not just their legalistic concepts."

For instance, he said, at each service, he will take 15 or 20 minutes to explain four words from the prayers. "When they reach those four words, or at another time, [the congregants] stop and contemplate them."

The next time, he will choose four other words, and so on. "It doesn't seem like much, but over a year, think what you can accomplish."

It is not only the unaffiliated that can benefit from heightened spiritual awareness. Many of the observant "want to go to shul, daven, and then go home. They miss the ecstacy of davening."

Similarly, he said, most women do not understand the symbolism of the Shabbat candles. "The yellow part of the flame stands for strength and commitment; the blue for giving and sharing. Together, they create the spiritual element of the home for the whole week."

Consultation with residents promised

The issue of transfer policy raised a number of questions, such as where those who were transferred would go and whether there would be more people who have to go to chronic care beds because of the staffing changes.

Medical director Michael Gordon assured the audience that moves would be made after full consultation with the resident's family.

Vice president of community services Margaret MacAdam, said that every effort is made to move people to the Baycrest Hospital, but if that is not possible, or if there are no free beds, then they must go elsewhere.

"In the past, some people could stay even if their situation declined," MacAdam said. Now, because of the fewer numbers of registered nurses, "there will probably be more who have to go to the hospital."

Many questions related to the effect the fewer numbers of nurses would have. One person asked what would happen if there was more than one emergency in JHA, when there was only nurse available. The answer given was that either hospital staff would come to help, or 911 would be called.

Another person asked if the available staff would be able to assess a resident's condition or help them if an emergency situation arose. The answer to this question was that the health care aides and RPNs know the residents well enough to know if something is wrong and are trained to recognize emergencies.

In Baycrest's defence, Harrison said that there were increased costs involved in running the new building, particularly in utilities and maintenance. She did not reply to the question of why this as well as other related problems, were not recognized before the move.

Herbert added that the Health Services Restructuring Board has studied the need for more chronic care beds, and a proposal for three more floors of these beds will be presented to the government.

Ferguson-Paré said that during the pilot study, there will be attempts to deploy nursing staff to where they are most needed, such as on floors with Alzheimer's patients.

One questioner warned that after the eight-month pilot study, the pressure on the remaining staff could lead to increased pressure, an erosion of their confidence, and the loss of their faith in, and allegiance to, the institution.

"By the end of that eight months, you may found that you have lost a system, and find yourself hard pressed to recover."

Jack Haft, co-chair of the family advisory council, said that the council "wants the assurance that as many residents as possible can stay within the Baycrest family."

MacAdam said that "to the best extent, if there is a vacancy [in the hospital], top priority goes to a JHA resident."

One of the most vociferous concerns was regarding the role of senior management, or what was seen as too many vice-presidents. Calls were made for some or most of them to be dismissed.

The panel stressed that all changes conformed to ministry of health guidelines for nursing homes.

Pringle promised that the board would consider seriously all the concerns expressed at the meeting, and would continue to keep residents and families informed.

Snider helped create day school system

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Obituary

TORONTO — Jennie (Papernick) Snider, 97, who served as principal of the general studies department of the Associated Hebrew Day School for more than 30 years, died recently at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care where she was a resident.

A master architect of the day school system, she was an iron-fisted principal who meted out her brand of no-nonsense discipline combined with her motherly concern for every student.

In 1921, she entered Teachers' College, and became one of the first Jewish public school teachers in Canada.

Unusual for her time, she spent one year teaching in London England and on her holidays, she visited Russia, Egypt and what was then Palestine.

In 1940, she was hired by the Toronto Hebrew Day School (now Associated Hebrew Day School) to teach Grade 1. She soon demonstrated her strong administrative qualities and became the first principal of the English department.

She was instrumental in helping the school grow from that one class to a highly regarded day school which now has more than 2000 students.

Her many students will affectionately remember her whistle and handbell – her discipline tactics which were intended to strike fear but became the symbol of caring and concern.

She had a love for music and would often accompany a class play or special event. Although she was not in the Hebrew department, she would often lead the Birkat Hamazon.

Jennie Snider is survived by her daughters, Lenore Solway and Elsa Skuy, three grandsons, and four great-grandchildren.

Jewish Life

Humanistic view of the world

CAN WE BE GOOD WITHOUT GOD? An Exploration of Behaviour and the Need to Believe*, by Robert Buckman Viking $29.00

Books
Bernard Baskin

Some of my good friends never darken the doorway of a synagogue. They don't believe in a Supreme Being. And yet they are good, caring, honest people, sensitive to the needs of others, generous with their time, their love, their property.

The author of this well-reasoned, popularly written book is a Toronto physician, closely involved with the program of the Humanist Association of Canada. For him, human beings are a "myth-hugging" species, easily frightened and fearful of the unknown. A portion of their brain disposes them to seek divine or spiritual interpretations of experiences that are seen or felt.

Moreover, they respond to such basic biological features as herd-instinct, natural aggression and gross overpopulation. He writes, "As a species, we have used almost every imaginable excuse as a justification for our inborn inter-herd aggressive instincts, including race, culture, language and politics. These can all be precipitating factors in starting conflicts – but it is important to note that religion has always featured very prominently in that list."

He then lists some prime examples of religious persecution and atrocities: The Crusades, the Spanish Inquisition, the slaughter of the Huguenots, the Manichean schism, dozens of wars between Protestants and Catholics, between Muslims and Christians, between Hindus and Muslims and civilian slaughter on the largest scale yet known, that of more than six million people, mostly Jews, in Hitler's Third Reich.

The real issue, he insists, is whether it would be a better world if we imagined that God did not exist and if we behaved in accordance with that possibility, trying to sort out our own messes and trying to create our own solutions.

One quickly thinks of some of those who have tried to create their own solutions without God – Stalin, Hitler, Pol Pot and the other godless mass murderers of history.

A person of mature religious conviction possesses the best possible reason for ethical conduct. If this is a universe of accident, in which things happen without reason or purpose, if we have no assurance that our high ethical ideals can be achieved and that ethical conduct is part of the plan or scheme of things, then why should people sacrifice for the sake of others?

On the other hand, if our ethical conduct enables us to advance the cause of human spiritual evolution, then a person has good reason to forego some of the conveniences and comforts he might want for himself in favour of decisions that will help others.

Buckman's highest ethical formulation, even more basic, he believes, than the Golden Rule is this; "Stop and think about the effect of what you are about to do on the people you are about to do it to."

He seems, however, unable to appreciate or properly consider the mystical and emotional aspects of religion – its drama, poetry, colour and ritual – and how and why it has inspired some of the greatest works of art, music and architecture through the ages.

This is an honest, lucid and thoughtful non-theistic approach to a complex subject of perennial interest. Recent surveys indicate that over 90 percent of Canadians believe in God. Evidently, the humanists face a formidable task.

Remembering rescuers of children

By SUZANNE AGASEE
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Approximately 380 child survivors, second and third generations from different parts of the world recently gathered in Washington, D.C.

They came to remember and to express their love, friendship, joy and deep gratitude to OSE, the incredible Jewish men and women who rescued them and approximately 6,000 other Jewish children before, during and after the Shoah.

The Oeuvre de Secours aux Enfants – OSE – was founded in 1912 by a group of Jewish doctors and intellectuals in Russia. Their goal was to improve the social and medical conditions of Jewish families in need. In 1922, OSE's head office moved to Berlin and, shortly thereafter, Albert Einstein became its honorary president. Ten years later, the OSE moved to Paris where it continued to assist Jewish families.

Even before the outbreak of World War II, Jewish refugee children arriving from Germany and Austria were placed in OSE homes in the Paris region.

In 1940, OSE personnel began to provide social services inside French internment camps, helping to provide sanitary conditions for thousands of foreign Jews, including German Jews who had been deported to France.

Their special task however, was to extricate the children from these camps and place then into OSE's newly opened homes. Hundreds of children found shelter in the 14 homes, largely staffed by Jewish adults, operating in the "Vichy" zone. American visas obtained with the help of Quakers and the American Friends Service Committee allowed 300 children to emigrate to the United States in 1941-1942.

After the Germans occupied most of Vichy France in November 1942, OSE intensified its secret activities to protect Jewish children. Although its Jewish administrators and social workers were themselves hounded and persecuted, they risked their lives to produce false papers and locate hiding places in non-Jewish homes and institutions for thousands of children.

In July 1942, I was three years old living in Paris with my mother, father, grandmother and two brothers when they came to deport us. My mother took a knife and threatened to kill herself if we were taken. They took my mother and father who disappeared into the hell of Auschwitz.

That same night, a woman from the OSE underground took us out of our home and sheltered us in her home. My grandmother though, was caught and was sent to the gas chambers.

This woman was able to hide us. I was hidden for a short while in a convent and then afterwards, throughout the war, with different Catholic families. After the war, when we could not find our parents, she put us in an OSE home in Fontainebleau. We were brought to Canada in 1948.

After the liberation of Buchenwald in 1945, the OSE took charge of 427 surviving children and adolescents by placing them in special rehabilitation facilities in France. Among those cared for were the writer Elie Wiesel and the Chief Rabbi of Israel, Meir Israel Lau. OSE provided the necessary medical, psychological and educational services.

At the reunion in Washington, we saw a beautiful film, The Children of Chabannes, which tells how the people of Chabannes, a village in southern France, saved the lives of 400 Jewish refugee children.

The film was co-directed and produced by Dean Wetherell and Lisa Gossel, whose father and uncle were two of the children saved.

We were guests of the French Embassy at a concert and reception where 14 individuals and three organizations were honoured with citations and plaques for their heroism and bravery. His Excellency Monsieur Francois Bujon de L'estang, the French ambassador, read a message from Prime Minister Lionel Jospin to the OSE organization and its honourees, and the children that they saved.

We also had the opportunity to visit the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum where a special tribute to OSE was held during which we lit candles in the Hall of Memories for our dear departed loved ones.

Suzanne Agasee lives in Toronto. She has worked for almost 30 years in the community with people with developmental disabilities. She and her family will be forever grateful to the people of OSE.

Chanukah – part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Put on your yarmulke
Here comes Chanukah
So much funukah
To celebrate Chanukah
– Adam Sandler.

Adam is right. Chanukah is funakah. And it's almost here. So here are my Top Eight reasons to travel the Internet this Festival of Lights.

Reason No. 1: The Music.

You can listen to Adam Sandler's Chanukah Song online [http://www.chanuka.com/]. Just be prepared for the occasional Adam Sandlerian type of lyric. Or if your tastes run a bit more traditional, go to Aish Hatorah and listen to Chanukah, Oh Chanukah, Ma'oz Tsur, I Have a Little Dreidel and more [http://aish.com/holidays/Chanukah/songfest.asp]. The lyrics are printed at this site so you can sing along. Over at the Ort site [http:// www.ort.org/ort/hanukkah/song.html], there is sheet music for Ma'oz Tsur, Mi Yemalel and Chanukah.

Another favourite song associated with the holiday is G. F. Handel's oratorio Judas Maccabeus which celebrates the victories of the ancient Jewish loyalists against their pagan foes. [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/981210_HandelHanukkah.html]. Eliezer Segal examines how one of Handel's themes, See the Conquering Hero Comes, has been adopted by Jews as a Chanukah melody.

Reason No. 2: The Menorahs.

One of the central customs of the holiday is the lighting of the menorah. For clear instructions about the order and directions for lighting, check out Virtual Jerusalem's mega-site [http://www.vjholidays.com/chanukah/customs.htm].

Chanukiyot have been made from almost every substance imaginable. Just when you think you've seen it all, you stumble onto the Lego Menorah page [http://www.net1plus.com/users/ohl/hanuka.html]. Oren Levine has three great designs including a chanukiyah on wheels and another with the shamash in the form of a Lego dreidel.

Reason No. 3: The Gelt.

The exchange of coins is a tradition of Chanukah but in From Gelt to Gifts [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/961121_Geltl.html], Eliezer Segel looks at the curious frenzy of gift-giving that has evolved at this time of the year.

In her article, Will Your Hanukkah Survive the Christmas Frenzy?, Susan Linn offers advice for Jewish parents [http://www.familyeducation.com/article/0,1120,3-10992-0-1,00.html].

"From Frosty to Santa, the secular symbols of Christmas – and the magical world they suggest – are so enticing for children that no matter how hard parents try to twist Chanukah into a 'Jewish Christmas,' it comes off as a pale and not very satisfying substitute."

Linn gives advice about how to talk about Chanukah with your children. She suggests minimizing or eliminating gift-giving during Chanukah and concentrate on enjoying the holiday's more traditional pleasures. She also gives ideas about creating your own family traditions.

Most gelt exchanged today is made of chocolate. Of course, you could drop by the store to stock up. But why not mint your own? Try out Chocolate Mint Chanukah Gelt [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/HANUKKAH/Sweets_Chocolate-Mint_Hanukah_Gelt_-_pareve.html].

Or for some truly rich coins, try Gil Marks' luscious gelt using butter, heavy cream and liqueur [http://www.njo.com/savor/ledger/a13334.html].

Reason No. 4: The Dreidels.

One of the best known symbols of the holiday is the dreidel or sevivon.

You can find a brief history at the Ort site [http://www.ort.org/ort/hanukkah/]. In Poker, Dreidel and Hannukah, Robin Treistman looks at the dreidel and asks: if Judaism traditionally frowns on gambling, "how is it that once a year, children pull out a funny, little, squarish top, engraved on four sides with Hebrew letters, and ... gamble?" [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/dreidle.htm]

Sure it can't match the excitement of betting on a dreidel against your friends, but if you're alone you may want to take on your computer in a dreidel competition [http://www.billybear 4kids.com/holidays/hanukkah/dreidel2.htm]. Press a button, spin against the computer and if your luck isn't great, no one will know.

Stay tuned for my next four reasons next week.

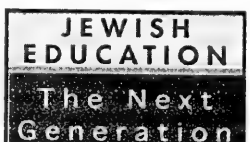
Searching for educational meaning

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Complaining about schools is part of our cultural landscape, like griping about politics or bemoaning the sad state of one's favourite sports team, destined to finish last once again.



But surveying the current state of educational opportunities for many Orthodox children in Toronto has become more than an amusing perennial pastime. For many parents, hope that became disappointment and then resignation has now surfaced as anger.

Of course, even to use the term "Orthodox education" is to imply a unity of methodology and purpose that does not exist in such schools. There is a significant difference between the outlook and sensibility of so called "modern Orthodox" schools and their brethren to the right. Let us, in this column, offer a few preliminary problems that face modern Orthodox education everywhere in the current historical epoch. In no particular order:

• If you don't pay the teachers enough, you will lose the best minds of this generation to pursuits other than Jewish education. This is not speculation, but fact. So it is truly put up or be silent when it comes to asking for better, more sophisticated teachers.

• A sore dearth of exemplary role models for the kids to emulate. The hockey standings and the latest business ventures of the rich and infamous seem to have created a good deal more grist for the Shabbat morning shul conversation than any Rabbi Solovetchik-like lonely quest for religious meaning.

• The blistering corrosiveness of contemporary trash culture. "Modern" for our children simply does not translate as Faulkner, Matisse and Hawking. Invariably, what it descends to is instant messaging, wrestling and pornotainment. "Modern Orthodoxy" must face the music of its name: is the synthesis suggested by the term simply a code word for a complete surrender to the prevailing zeitgeist?

• Most of all, there is the overriding problem with "the vision thing" (as another Bush descends on us, nostalgia beckons). What is it that modern Orthodox schools really want to offer their kids? What vision of reality? What vision of truth? What actual philosophy of existence? Can passion be delivered to modern Orthodox youth, passion not just for Torah but for the glory of Creation that can be found in all sorts of bends in the road (art, literature, music, science, history, psychology, philosophy, i.e. what the astronomer Timothy Ferris calls "the big shebang")?

Students want a religion which directly addresses their spiritual and emotional desert places. They want teachers who will help them to think and feel beyond the text or, even better, through the text. They want inspiration, and yes, they want to be loved. And whether they know it or not, they want to be persuaded of the necessity and truth of the religion that they are being told they owe an allegiance to and which demands of them halachic fidelity.

To achieve all this, schools which attempt to salvage tradition will have to find the elements designed to counteract the modern context depicted by the poet Philip Larkin with such poignant irony: "Bonds and gesture pushed to one side/like an outdated combine harvester/And everyone young going down the long slide/To happiness, endlessly."

Janina Bar and Joe Riesenbach.

Survivor meets woman who saved his family

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For two years and five days in 1943 and 1944, the Riesenbach family's world consisted of a tiny attic in a farmer's barn, or, when danger was particularly acute, a coffin-like space under a mound of potatoes in a cold cellar.

Five members of the Riesenbach family lived in those cramped spaces, subsisting on a paltry diet of boiled potatoes as their muscles atrophied from lack of use.

The Riesenbachs never forgot Josef and Julia Bar and their teenaged daughter Janina, the Polish Catholic family who risked their lives to save them from the Nazis and their local collaborators.

When Soviet forces pushed the Germans out of their Silesian village of Markowa, the Riesenbachs received a new lease on life.

Joe Riesenbach made a new life for himself in Winnipeg, but he kept contact with the Bars, sending them parcels of clothing, food and "luxury" items they could not get in Communist Poland.

When he retired a few years ago, Joe offered to bring Janina to Canada for a visit. Citing her age, she declined. Instead, she sent her grandson, Wacek Balawejder, who twice visited the Riesenbachs in Winnipeg and Joe's sister, Genny Wasser, in Toronto. He spent a total of 14 months here.

Cindy Wasser, Joe's niece, reciprocated that visit, travelling to Markowa about a year ago. She met Janina and relayed a message "that it was her fondest wish to see Joe and his sisters before she died."

Still, Joe was hesitant. "I had no interest to return to Poland. I have bad memories," he said.

In June 1999, however, he received a letter from the Holocaust Museum in Washington, to which he had given mementoes of his past. A family from Argentina visiting the museum recognized a post-war Shanah Tovah that featured a photo of the Riesenbach family.

Gabriel Anmuth, a civil engineer in Bahia Blanca, had seen the same postcard among his late father's letters and photos. It turned out that his late father, Netalio, was a distant cousin of the Riesenbachs.

In January, the Riesenbachs met Gabriel and his wife Marisa, a Hebrew school teacher, in Miami. They talked about their family histories.

Gabriel "wanted to visit Poland to see the roots where his grandfather came from," Joe said. Joe's son, Ron, was ready to join the Anmuths and so Joe signed on as well. In October, Joe, his wife Ruth, Ron and the Anmuths made the trip.

They visited Warsaw, where they were intensely moved by the memorials in the city's former Jewish ghetto. They took a train in Cracow, where Polish Catholics are reviving the city's once vibrant Jewish culture. And they visited Auschwitz-Birkenau, only a short distance away.

In Cracow, they were met by a driver and interpreter arranged by Shtetl Shleppers, a Texas-based non-profit organization that organizes custom tours of Eastern Europe.

Heading to Markowa, Joe was a little apprehensive, but "I felt good because I had part of my family with me. As I approached the village, I knew it wouldn't be the same."

His family home had been renovated and appropriated by the local municipality. Some of the old Jewish cemeteries were gone and even the barn where they were hidden had been torn down.

But waiting for them in front of their house were Janina Bar and her family, children and grandchildren, about 15 people in all. Joe and Janina embraced immediately and their emotions spilled over.

"Once I came there, they couldn't tear us apart. The tears came, of course. I tried to toughen up," he said.

The Bars invited them into their home and the families talked and talked. Food was piled high on the table and there was plenty of vodka and wine to fortify them.

"Janina said she loved my mother. They were like sisters," Joe said.

Janina recounted an occasion when the Riesenbachs were nearly caught. One Sunday, when the local priest spoke from the pulpit and told his parishioners that two Jewish families were still unaccounted for, he urged them to leave the church and do a house to house search to find them.

Josef Bar rushed home immediately and moved the Riesenbachs from the barn's attic to a space he had constructed for them under a pile of potatoes. Even though local villagers searched the cellar, their hiding place was not found.

"If the Nazi had found us out, they [the Bars] would have been executed on the spot," Joe said. "It happened. It happened in the village... Thirteen Poles [including children] and seven or eight Jews were executed in the same village."

While many in the village were inclined to hunt down Jews, it was the Bars' deep religious faith that saved the Riesenbachs.

"Janina's mother, Julia, was a true Christian. She believed in fate, that if God sent these people to them, it was God's will that she help them," Joe said.

Many others in the village didn't see it that way – and still don't. The Bars' wartime exploits remain a closely guarded family secret in Markowa for fear of attack by anti-Semitic neighbours. When Wacek accompanied their Jewish visitors outside the home, he shied away from them and turned his back so neighbours wouldn't conclude he was with them, Ruth said. The Bars "told us not to attract attention," she added.

Still, for the Riesenbachs and Anmuths, the visit was an experience to be cherished.

"Ron called it a highlight of his life. You come back changed," said Ron's wife, Perla.

"It was definitely worthwhile," Joe said. "It was very fulfilling."

Canadian museums may hold Nazi loot

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two leading Canadian museums announced last week they will follow the example of art galleries around the world and take measures to find the rightful owners of works in their collections that may have been looted from Jews during the Nazi era.

The National Gallery of Canada and the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO) say they both possess artworks with suspicious "gaps" in their provenance, or history, relating to the years 1933 to 1945 – the exact span of the Third Reich.

The institutions, both supported with public dollars, will be posting images of the artworks on their Web sites in the coming weeks, in the hope that any mystery surrounding their ownership will be settled.

The National Gallery has about 100 paintings and sculptures with incomplete histories relating to the war era, while the AGO has discovered 20 paintings with similarly suspect backgrounds. The National Gallery expects its list to be posted in the next few weeks (at national.gallery.ca) while the AGO says its images will be online in the new year (www.ago.on.ca).

There is the possibility that some of the objects now in the Canadian museums belonged to Jewish families and were plundered by the Nazis, Pierre Theberge, the National Gallery's director, said last week. "Let's hope there is some response," he told the Ottawa Citizen.

Theberge said the National Gallery's move is part of the "reassessment of the last 50 or 60 years, and part of the general movement of restitution."

The CJN reported last month that Matthew Teitelbaum, the AGO's director, had launched an investigation into the history of some of the museum's holdings.

"We don't anticipate difficulties with our collection," he said at the time, adding recently, however, that the museum will be on high alert for art treasures slated to arrive in May from Russia. There are fears that parts of the collection may include Nazi-plundered works.

While noting that Canadian museums have generally lagged behind their American and European counterparts, Canadian Jewish Congress hailed the moves.

"But this is just the first step" said Nathan Leipciger, chair of CJC's Holocaust committee. "As has been done in other countries, we need to look at all works of art acquired by our art institutions after 1933 and produced before 1946 to determine whether there are in fact pieces of looted art in Canadian museums and galleries. We need a more transparent method of examining this issue to erase any doubts and to deal with still unanswered questions."

Bonnie Czegledi, a Toronto lawyer who specializes in international art law, says the Canadian museums were more or less shamed into acting.

"I'm not surprised," she said of the National Gallery and AGO initiatives. "Either they speak now or be publicly humiliated later.

"Every other country has done a lot more compared to us. I think they had to act."

Hector Feliciano, one of the world's foremost art sleuths, told a Toronto audience in October that no Nazi-plundered artworks found their way into Canada.

But Czegledi said she would be very surprised if such art did not wind up here.

"Canada was no exception," she said, noting that huge quantities of stolen artworks were "dumped" in New York during the war years. There's little doubt, she feels, that some of that was smuggled into Canada, and eventually made its way into public and private collections.

However, laying claim to stolen art is difficult, she explained.

Unlike looted property and unpaid war-era insurance policies, there is rarely a paper trail when it comes to art and there is no uniform way to proceed.

She does not advocate litigation. Rather, museums should be approached with affidavits or insurance policies – anything that can identify the piece and link it to Holocaust survivors or their heirs.

Claimants may also rely on Canada's Criminal Code, which makes it a crime to deal in stolen goods, even if the transaction took place outside Canada.

The New York-based Art Loss Register may also be of some help. It charges a small fee, but acts only for museums or for individuals buying from other individuals. (The registry may be accessed at www.artloss.com).

The Canadian galleries may have been spurred by the federal government. In October, Canada sent two delegates to a conference in Vilnius on looted intellectual and cultural property.

At the time, a spokesperson for the government said Canada would "quite likely" follow up by examining plundered artworks in this country, and working with museums.

Last week's announcement follows similar action in the United States, where an agreement reached between American art museums and a U.S. presidential Holocaust commission requires that the museums disclose on their Web sites the background of all artworks acquired between 1933 and 1945.

In Vienna, a government committee last week recommended the return of two paintings looted by the Nazis from Austrian Jews. The paintings by Gustav Klimt include Lady With Hat and Boa, valued at up to $9.5 million.

Other recent cases include:

- Last year, the Montreal Museum of Fine Art returned a 16th century oil painting by the Italian master Giorgio Vasari to the government of Hungary.
- In 1996, five war-era drawings found in the collection of the AGO were voluntarily returned to the Berlin Museum.

Czegledi estimates the Nazis acquired one-fifth of the western world's art.

AJC hires new director of campus programming

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX – Lysa Magder is juggling several balls at once but considers each of equal importance.

Magder, 34, is the Atlantic Jewish Council's (AJC) newly appointed director of campus programming and young professional development as well as the associate campaign manager for the United Jewish Appeal in Atlantic Canada.

"Without UJA funding, we [the AJC] wouldn't exist," Magder says. "We have to keep young professionals, singles, couples and families involved in the community. And for the university students, we have to ensure they maintain their connection to the Jewish community at large."

Programs for young professionals being organized regularly

Magder, who was raised in Toronto and is now the mother of two small children, studied urban planning at the University of British Columbia and worked as an ESL teacher in Vancouver before coming to Halifax. She was also active in her Vancouver synagogue.

"At the synagogue, I was introduced to community programming and loved it," she says.

"I really felt community education was my thing. I was inspired. When this position [at the AJC] opened, it was a natural for me."

She knows working with small populations in small Atlantic communities will be challenging.

"It will be important to make university students outside Halifax feel part of the Atlantic provinces Jewish Students Federation. There are 70 students in the region registered with us and a large number [are] not affiliated."

Programs for young professionals are being organized regularly.

"We'll hold a regional convention for everyone in February. We're having Shabbat dinners hosted in private homes in Halifax every other week, usually with about 10 students, and all at kosher homes or homes where the food is prepared kosher.

"We had a wine and cheese after a Havdalah service. We'll get togther for a Chanukah event and we're working on a speaker series on topics relevant to that age group, topics that don't necessarily have to be Judaically focused."

Magder says a problem is finding a common ground, like a Hillel House, for the students to meet.

Nevertheless, she says, there has to be a building process. "I don't expect instant success. I'm learning too, learning [about] the community and growing into the position."

Magder says arevim in Moncton and St. John's, Nfld. make her job easier. Arevim are individuals or couples from Israel posted in small Jewish communities in Canada by the AJC to act as Jewish resources – sometimes teaching, sometimes programming activities, sometimes offering the only Jewish guidance in town.

"They're essential to me, extra people to help the program and make my job worthwhile," Magder says. "They are real inspirations."

דמעות תנין

מָמָה מיה

שיטת הבחירות

שמש על המוח

שנה בישראל היא כמו חמש שנים במדינה אחרת. זה החסבר חיחידי לעובדה שמשאלי דעת הקהל נתנים לנתניהו רוב בבחירות הקרובות. הזיכרון הקצר חוא משהוא משהוא יותר מידי שמש קופחת על חמות.

דימוי עצמי ירוד

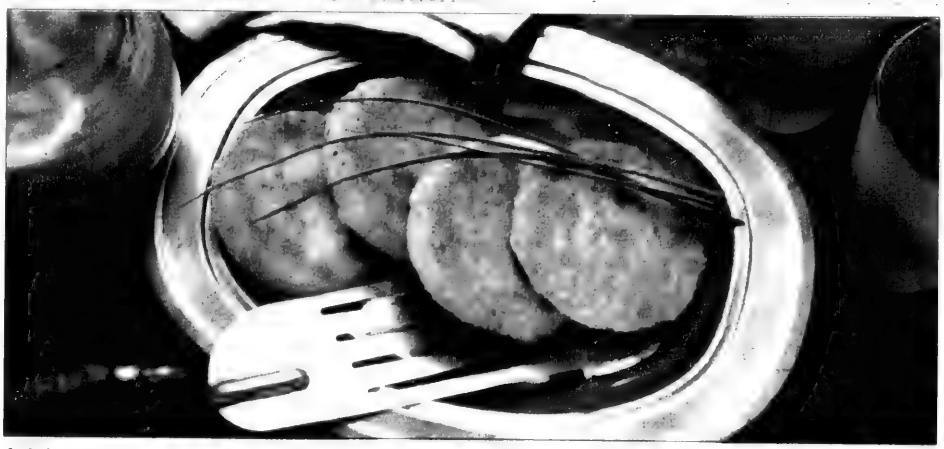
SHMOOZIN

"The secret to making the perfect potato latke is really quite simple – if at first you don't succeed, fry, fry again!"

Chanukah Delights



Chanukah is still the time for latkes—greasy or not

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The celebration of Chanukah would not be complete without potato latkes, the traditional food consumed by Ashkenazi Jews on this festive holiday.

Chanukah, traditionally, is the time to enjoy greasy food like potato latkes – potato pancakes fried in oil. The grease symbolizes the miracle of the oil that burned in the menorah for eight days when Judah the Maccabee rededicated the Temple, after defeating Antiochus.

However, with people so health conscious in this day and age, the excess oil is drained off before the latkes are served, and some people even bake them, says Thelma Barer-Stein, author of the award-winning You Eat What You Are: People Culture and Food Traditions (Firefly Books 1999). She said there's less emphasis on eating grease. "It's the latkes that have become the tradition now."

And while the Jewish people have been celebrating Chanukah for more than 2,000 years, the consumption of potato latkes would not have started before the 15th century because potatoes did not become a staple of the European diet until the New World was discovered; potatoes were brought to Europe by the conquistadors from the Americas, Barer-Stein says.

"When people accepted potatoes as food in Europe, they found all kinds of uses," she said. "And potato latkes was one. This is conjecture."

She noted that potatoes were a cheap satisfying food especially when they were cooked or fried with fat.

She said Sephardi Jews eat soufganiot or doughnuts on Chanukah, which she believes can be traced back to a fried honey ball – loukomathes – that originated in Greece. She added that soufganiot are popular in Israel and are often incorporated in North American Chanukah celebrations.

As for the earliest of Chanukah culinary traditions, Barer-Stein said that Jews probably dipped bread into oil to commemorate the eight days of light.

Jews dipped bread into oil to commemorate the days of light

You Eat What You Are, an encyclopedia that looks at food and its social histories, recently netted Barer-Stein a Gold Award from Cuisine Canada, a national organization of people, companies and institutions devoted to promoting local food and beverages in the five major regions of Canada.

When the first edition of You Eat What You Are was published in 1979, no one could understand how she could write 720 pages about food without including recipes, Barer-Stein said, adding that the second edition is twice the size of the original, and covers 170 cultural groups. "[But now] nobody would question why this book was written. In 20 years there has been a lot change for the good. People understand multiculturalism.

She stressed that the purpose of her book was to replace tolerance, which she finds "demeaning and insulting" with an "understanding, appreciation and respect for those who differ from us. Food is an easy door to open between cultures."

In response to The CJN's query about the origins of potato latkes, Barer-Stein reviewed potato pancake recipes from a number of countries and concluded that the Hungarian recipe is the closest to the modern-day latke.

The Hungarian potato pancake, which is made from grated raw potato and raw onion, flour and eggs, is dropped into hot fat and served hot with sour cream, she said.

Kartoffelpuffer, a potato pancake dish popular in northern Germany, is similar to the Hungarian recipe, she said. Made with grated raw potato and onion, flour and eggs, these pancakes are served with slightly salted unsweetened apple sauce.

Frying is not a popular cooking technique in the former Czechoslovakia, which is famous for dumplings of all kinds, Barer-Stein noted. The Czechs use the same kind of mixture as traditional latkes – raw or cooked grated potatoes and onion, egg and flour – shape the mixture into balls and poach them in broth or gravy.

Filled potato pancakes from Ukraine have more in common with knishes than with latkes, said Barer-Stein.

These pancakes, a thick dough made from potatoes that are peeled, boiled and mashed, are molded into flat cakes; the filling is put on one side and the other side of the pancake is folded down and sealed, she said. They are brushed with egg, dusted with bread crumbs, baked or fried and served with sour cream or pureed tomatoes.

But tracing recipes to definitive geo-political regions is not an exact science, according to Barer-Stein. "The countries [in Europe] are so close together the recipes travelled from one country to the next. It's difficult to say this belongs there."

The two ways of grating potatoes for latkes – with the peel off or on – do not appear to be tied to any specific geographical region, she noted.

Some old recipes sources, she said, suggest coarsely grating well-washed potatoes with the skins on and leaving them in a bowl for 10 to 15 minutes until they turn brown; the mixture is put in a colander and rinsed with a lot of cold water to remove the brown colour.

Barer Stein said this method, which is not as common as the peeling-before-grating method, gets rid of the starch and the latkes end up being very white inside – the skins seem to disappear.

Both methods, she said, call for the excess water to be removed before the rest of the ingredients are added; the latkes are cooked in "hot fat, which seals the outside quickly, leaving the inside soft and tender."

The co-author of To Life: Setting a New Standard for Delectable Healthy Eating within Cherished Kosher Traditions (Culture Concepts Inc.), Barer-Stein, along with co-authors Esther Schwartz and Risa Vandersluis, developed their own lighter recipe for latkes in their book:

ASHKENAZI POTATO PANCAKES

large, deep heavy skillet for frying
4 large potatoes, grated coarsely
1 cup of mashed potatoes
2 eggs
3 tbsp. flour
1 tsp. baking powder
3 tbps. grated onion (optional)
salt and pepper to taste.
1 tbsp oil

Put grated potatoes into a bowl of cold water to keep them white. Drain excess water when all the potatoes are grated. Combine all the ingredients in a large bowl.

Heat large skillet, adding oil to coat the bottom. When oil is hot drop potato batter by large spoonfuls into the skillet. When one side is browned (about 4 minutes), turn, flatten slightly and brown second side. Drain pancakes on a paper towel. Keep latkes warm on a plate in the oven.

EASY MEALS: Roast chicken is the classic main course for any holiday meal.

The Mendelson twins have a twin cookbook launch

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

On an early evening in the fall, dozens of people mill around a large old house in mid-town Toronto.

They're on hand to toast twin sisters Lynn and Susan Mendelson, who are holding a twin book launch at Lynn's home.

Most of the guests are friends and neighbours of the hostess, a local caterer. She has just published her second cookbook – Chicken! Chicken! Chicken! And more Chicken! (Whitecap Books).

A Vancouver caterer and food writer, Susan co-authored her eighth cookbook, The Lazy Gourmet (Whitecap Books), with chef Joey Cruz.

Early the next morning before heading back to Vancouver she squeezes in an interview with The CJN.

A Toronto native, Susan, 48, moved west to study theatre arts in the early '70s at University of British Columbia. She later pursued social work and worked at the Vancouver East Cultural Centre. To help pay the rent, she says, she sold carrot cake, as well as cheese cake from a recipe she developed, at intermission during performances at the centre.

Her cheesecake became so well known in Vancouver, a CBC radio producer approached her to develop other recipes on a regular basis for local listeners, she says.

That led her to write cookbooks and start a catering business which is now one of the city's largest, she says.

Susan says her grandmother, Fay Bigman, inspired her to cook. "She was a fabulous cook and incredible baker.

"She had always wished she had a little tea shop to sell her baking."

Unlike her grandmother, Susan pursued a career in food. "I wanted to check out my dream."

This year, Susan, the mother of a 10-year-old girl, made Chatelaine magazine's list of the top 75 business women in the country, she says.

Her first cookbook, Mama Never Cooked Like This, published in 1980, became somewhat of a classic, she says.

Her mother is a great baker, but not a big eater, she says. "Our whole family is into food."

Lynn, like Susan had always enjoyed cooking and entertaining, but did not consider cooking or working with food as a career choice, she says.

"I entertained food-wise. When I was in university, I was always cooking, having people over for meals. I catered the first seder at Trent University.

"I say I got my degree between dinner parties."

She went on to work with emotionally disturbed children in Toronto, and kept up her cooking and entertaining.

In 1985, when she was pregnant with her first child, Whitecap approached Lynn, now a mother of four, about doing a cookbook. She managed to put together the book, and Chicken! Chicken Chicken! was published just months before the birth of her daughter Joanna.

Susan continued working part time, leaving the work force permanently after her third child was born. "I just assumed that my days of being paid for my labour were over."

About three years ago, one of her neighbours asked her to cater a dinner party for his litigation group. "I had so many calls after that I was in business."

When her first chicken book sold out it was never re-issued, Lynn says. "I never pushed to have it republished. At The Cookbook Store they said it was one of the 10 most asked for cookbooks out of print.

The Cookbook Store staff urged her to do something with the book, but she never did, until someone from Whitecap saw the list, she says.

"He said, 'I'd like to do something with it.' "

She says writing the book was a long process of compiling and testing all the recipes she's used over the years. And when asked if she'll do another, she says she tells people: "It took me a lifetime to put this one together. I don't have another life left."

She says she and Susan both ended up going into the food business after embarking on other career paths. "We're identical twins. We both fell into the same kinds of things from totally different vantages and totally different sides of the country.

"We both love food. We both love entertaining. We both did what we loved. But not in a direct route."

SESAME SOY CHICKEN SALAD
From Chicken! Chicken! Chicken!

2 whole chicken breasts, skinned, deboned and cut into bite-size pieces
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 cup of cauliflower florets
1 cup of broccoli florets
4 carrots peeled and julienned
1 zucchini julienned with skin on ½ cup snow peas
½ cup sliced mushrooms
½ cup of shredded red cabbage
2 tbsp. toasted sesame seeds
1 recipe for ginger-sesame dressing

Saute chicken in oil on medium heat 2 to 3 minutes until the chicken is cooked and the colour is opaque. Remove chicken from skillet with slotted spoon and set aside. Drain well.

Steam cauliflower and broccoli over boiling water for 6 minutes, rinse with cold water, drain, and set aside. Steam carrots 4 to 5 minutes, rinse with cold water, drain and set aside. Steam zucchini 2 to 3 minutes and snow peas for 1 minute, rinse with cold water, drain, and set aside.

Put mushrooms and cabbage in a large bowl, add chicken, steamed vegetables. Toss with ginger sesame dressing and garnish with toasted sesame seeds. Serves 4 to 6.

Ginger Sesame Dressing

4 tbsp. red wine vinegar
2 tbsp. soy sauce
1 clove of garlic, chopped
2 tsp minced ginger
1 tsp. sugar
¾ cup vegetable oil
3 drops of sesame oil
2 tbsp. toasted sesame seeds

Combine vinegar, soy sauce and garlic, ginger and sugar. Put in food processor or blender. With motor running add oil in a thin steady stream. stir sesame seeds in by hand.

From The Lazy Gourmet

VEGETARIAN CHOPPED LIVER

2 tbsp vegetable oil
1 12 oz. can of green beans
1½ large onions, chopped or sliced
3 hard-boiled eggs
½ cup light toasted walnuts
1 tbsp chopped fresh parsley
1 tsp. capers
2 tbsp. mayonnaise
salt and pepper to taste

Drain green beans, set aside. Heat oil on medium heat and saute onions until carmelized. Put all ingredients into food processor and blend into a paste. Add a little more mayonnaise if necessary. Garnish with parsley and cherry tomatoes.

NICOISE SALAD

2 to 3 heads of romaine salad torn in bite-size pieces
1 lb. green beans, blanched
½ cup sliced black olives
8 hard-boiled eggs
1 4 to 6 oz. can of flaked tuna, drained
herb vinaigrette recipe

In a large bowl combine lettuce, green beans, olives and vinaigrette dressing, toss well.

Cut the eggs in half, length-wise and arrange on top of the salad. Pour flaked tuna over salad.

Herb Vinaigrette

½ cup white wine vinegar
1 tbsp chopped herbs (rosemary, chives. thyme or basil)
1 tbsp. honey
1 tsp. dijon mustard
¾ cup of olive oil
salt and ground pepper to taste

Best Wishes for a Happy Chanukah

Having a repertoire of appetizers is handy at Chanukah

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

With Chanukah just around the corner, and family and friends stopping by to help celebrate, it's nice to have a repertoire of appetizers to serve before the latkes and soufganiot are ready.

Some of the best and most beautiful containers for the appetizers come from the produce and bakery sections of your grocery. Hollowed out cabbages and squash make perfect bowls for dips and spreads or can be used to hold vegetable crudites.

A melon or pineapple is a great container for a creamy sweet dip. Lemon and orange cups also make attractive small containers for sweet or savoury dips and spreads. Whole bread loaves in different sizes and shapes that have been hollowed out can be filled with warm dips that you bake in the oven or cold dips and spreads for chips and crackers. You can also use the hollowed out bread loaves as containers for breadsticks or slices of bread.

Some appetizers to try:

CHICKEN & BEEF SATE

1 lb. chicken breast cutlets
1 steak, 1 in. thick (about 1¼ pounds)
2 large limes
1 tbsp. grated, peeled ginger root
2 tsp. sugar
24 (10-in.) wooden skewers
¼ cup soy sauce
2 garlic cloves, crushed with garlic press cucumber relish (below)
spicy peanut sauce (below)

Slice chicken cutlets lengthwise into ¾-inch-wide strips; place in medium bowl. Holding knife almost parallel to work surface, slice steak crosswise into thin strips; place in another bowl. From limes, grate 2 tsp. peel and squeeze 2 tbsp. juice. In small bowl, with fork, mix lime peel, lime juice, soy sauce, ginger, sugar, and garlic. Stir half of soy sauce mixture into chicken. Stir remaining soy sauce mixture into beef. Cover and refrigerate both bowls 30 minutes to marinate. Soak wooden skewers in water 20 minutes. Meanwhile, prepare spicy peanut sauce and cucumber relish. Thread chicken strips and beef strips separately on wooden skewers, accordion-style.

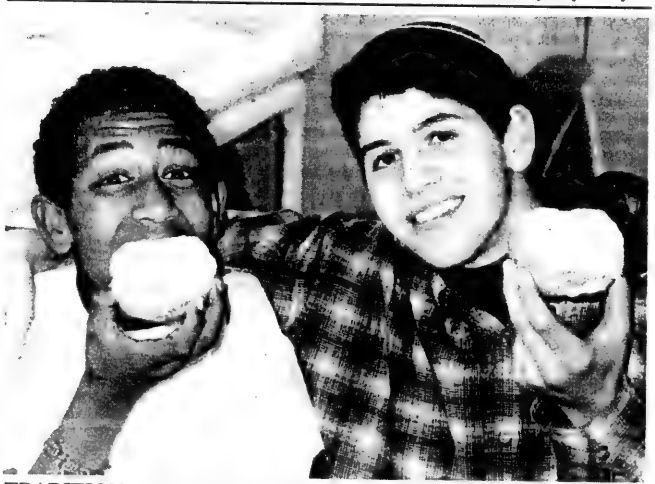
Using a grill pan or an outdoor grill, grill the chicken and beef strips over medium heat 3 to 7 minutes, turning once, until just cooked through (you can also broil the meat). Serve immediately with spicy peanut sauce and cucumber relish.

Spicy Peanut Sauce:

In medium bowl, with wire whisk or fork, mix ¼ cup creamy peanut butter, ¼ cup very hot tap water, 4 tsp. seasoned rice vinegar, 1 tbsp. soy sauce, 1 tbsp. light molasses, and ¼ tsp. crushed red pepper until smooth. Makes about ⅔ cup.

Cucumber Relish:

In medium bowl, with spoon, mix 4 medium Kirby cucumbers (about 4 oz. each), diced, ¼ cup seasoned rice vinegar, 2 tbsp. diced red onion, 1 tbsp. vegetable oil, and ¼ tsp. crushed red pepper. Makes about 2½ cups.



TRADITIONAL CHANUKAH TREAT: A Chanukah celebration is not complete without soufganiot, a traditional holiday treat.

ASIAN STUFFED MUSHROOMS

1 lb. mushrooms, large ones
2 tbsp. oil
3 large garlic cloves, peeled and minced
2 tbsp. fresh ginger, peeled and minced
¾ cup red bell pepper, finely chopped (1 medium pepper)
1 stalk bok choy, chopped (½ cup) (you can substitute celery)
1 tsp. sesame oil
1 tbsp. soy sauce
½ tsp. salt
½ cup fresh bread crumbs
1/4 tsp. chili paste
3 scallions, thinly sliced
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice

Preheat the oven to 375. Grease a baking pan. Pull the stems from the mushroom caps and chop them finely. Place the caps in the prepared baking pan. Heat the oil in a skillet over medium heat. Saute the garlic, ginger and red bell pepper just until tender, about 3 minutes. (Stir in a tbsp. or two of water if the ginger begins to stick.) Stir in the chopped mushroom stems and the bok choy. Cook until the mushrooms are tender and the liquid has evaporated, about 5 minutes more. Remove the pan from the heat, and stir in the sesame oil, soy sauce, salt, bread crumbs, chili paste, scallions, and lemon juice. Using a tsp., stuff the mushroom caps with the filling. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes, until the caps are tender. Serve immediately. Serves 6.

This can be doubled or tripled.

CHINESE FIRECRACKERS

1 tsp. oil
½ pound ground turkey breast
1 cup chopped cabbage
½ cup shredded carrots
2 green onion, finely chopped
1 tbsp. chili paste
1 tbsp. white wine
1 tsp. cornstarch
14 sheets phyllo dough
1 tbsp. and 1 tsp. vegetable oil
⅓ cup sweet and sour sauce

Heat 1 tsp. oil in 10-in. nonstick skillet over medium heat. Cook turkey, cabbage, carrot and onions in oil about 5 minutes, stirring frequently, until turkey is no longer pink and vegetables are crisp-tender.

Stir in chili paste. Mix wine and cornstarch; stir into turkey mixture. Cook uncovered, stirring occasionally, until slightly thickened. Heat oven to 375. Cut stack of phyllo sheets crosswise in half. Cover with waxed paper, then with damp towel to prevent them from drying out. Place 1 half-sheet of phyllo on flat surface. Brush with small amount of oil. Top with second half-sheet of phyllo. Place about 2 tbsp. turkey mixture on short end of phyllo; shape mixture into about 4-in. log. Roll up phyllo and turkey mixture. Twist phyllo 1 in. from each end to make firecracker shape. Place on ungreased cookie sheet. Repeat with remaining phyllo and turkey mixture.

Brush firecrackers with remaining oil. Bake 18 to 22 minutes or until phyllo is crisp and golden brown. Serve with sweet-and-sour sauce. Makes 14 servings.

APPLE DIP WITH A TWIST

A zesty dip, delicious with fruits and vegetables.

1¼ cups ranch dressing (you can use fat free)
1¼ cups grated apple
1 tbsp. prepared horseradish
¾ tsp. pumpkin pie spice
2 tsp. fresh lemon juice
¼ tsp. ground black pepper, or to taste

Mix the ranch dressing, grated apple, horseradish, pumpkin pie spice, lemon juice and pepper in a medium sized serving bowl and chill until serving. Makes 2 cups.

THAI EGGPLANT DIP

A tasty baked eggplant appetizer, served with baked pita bread wedges.

1 (1 lb.) eggplant
⅓ cup golden raisins, chopped
2 tbsp. water
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
2 tsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tsp. olive oil
¼ tsp. black pepper
⅛ tsp. salt
1 garlic clove, minced
4 (6-in.) pitas
½cup (2 ounces) shredded part-skim mozzarella cheese
3 tbsp. grated Parmesan cheese

Preheat oven to 425. Pierce eggplant several times with a fork, and wrap in foil. Place eggplant on a baking sheet, and bake at 425 for 1 hour. Cool slightly. Peel, seed, and mash eggplant with a potato masher. Combine raisins and water in a small bowl. Cover with plastic wrap and microwave at high 30 seconds. Let stand, covered, 10 minutes; drain. Add the raisins, basil, lemon juice, olive oil, pepper, salt and garlic to eggplant. Mix well and then preheat the broiler. Sprinkle the pitas with cheeses, and broil for 2 minutes or until cheese melts. Cut each pita into 6 wedges, and serve with a spoonful of eggplant dip on top. Serves 6 to 8. This can be doubled or tripled.

Soufganiot are a simple holiday treat

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The word soufganiot, is a modern Hebrew word that comes from the Greek word sufgan, which means puffed and fried.

The following recipes for soufganiot are straight forward and taste wonderful. Traditionally, the soufganiot is jelly filled and rolled in sugar but as always, when it comes to personal taste in fried foods, anything goes.

SIMPLE SOUFGANIOT

2 scant tbsp. (2 packages) active dry yeast
4 tbsp. sugar, plus sugar for rolling
¾ cup lukewarm water or milk
2½ cups unbleached all-purpose flour, sifted
2 large egg yolks
pinch of salt
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1½ tbsp. unsalted butter or pareve margarine, at room temperature vegetable oil for deep-frying
½ cup plum, strawberry or apricot jam

Sprinkle the yeast and 2 tbsp. of the sugar into the water or milk and stir to dissolve. Place the flour on a work surface and make a well in the centre. Add the yeast mixture, egg yolks, salt, cinnamon, and the remaining 2 tbsp. sugar. Knead well, about 5 minutes, working the butter or margarine into the dough and kneading until the dough is elastic. You can also use a food processor fitted with the steel blade to do this, processing about 2 minutes. Put the dough on a greased bowl, cover with plastic, and let it rise overnight in the refrigerator. Sprinkle flour on the work surface.

Roll out the dough to a ⅛-inch thickness using a 2-in. cookie cutter or floured drinking glass, cut out circles. Let the dough circles rise 15 minutes or more. With your hands, gently form the dough circles into balls.

Pour 2 inches of oil into a heavy pot and heat until very hot, about 375. Slip the donuts into the oil, 4 or 5 at a time, using a slotted spoon. Turn them when brown, after a few minutes, to crisp on the other side.

Drain on paper towels. Using a turkey baster or an injector available at cooking stores, inject a tsp. of jam into each doughnut. Then roll all of them in granulated sugar and serve immediately. You can make larger soufganiot if you like. Makes 24 2-in. soufganiot.

CLASSIC SOUFGANIOT

3¼ to 3½ cups all-purpose flour
2 packages active dry yeast
½ tsp. ground cinnamon
1 cup water
⅓ cup granulated sugar
2 tbsp. cooking oil
½ tsp. salt
1 egg
½ tsp. vanilla
¼ to ½ cup fruit preserves (strawberry, raspberry, blueberry, spread) cooking oil for deep frying sifted powdered sugar

In a large mixing bowl stir together 1¼ cups of the flour, the yeast, and cinnamon; set aside. In a medium saucepan heat and stir water, sugar, cooking oil, and salt just until warm (120 to 130 degrees). Add oil mixture to flour mixture; add egg and vanilla. Beat with an electric mixer on low to medium speed for 30 seconds, scraping the sides of the bowl constantly. Beat on high speed for 3 minutes. Using a wooden spoon, stir in as much of the remaining flour as you can. Turn dough out onto a lightly floured surface.

Knead in enough of the remaining flour to make moderately soft dough that is smooth and elastic (3 to 5 minutes total). Shape dough into a ball. Place in a lightly greased bowl, turning once to grease the surface of the dough.

Cover and let rise in a warm place until double in size (about 1 hour). Punch dough down. Turn dough out onto a lightly floured surface. Divide in half.

Cover and let rest for 10 minutes. Roll dough, 1 portion at a time, to ¼-in. thickness. Cut dough with a floured 2½-in. biscuit cutter, dipping cutter into flour between cuts. Place about ½ tsp. preserves or chocolate spread onto the centres of half of the circles. Lightly moisten edges of circles; top with remaining circles. Press edges together to seal.

Repeat with remaining dough and fillings. Reroll and cut trimmings. Fry filled donuts, 2 or 3 at a time, in deep hot oil (365 degrees) about 1 minute on each side or until golden, turning once with a slotted spoon.

Remove from oil; drain on paper towels. Sprinkle with powdered sugar. Cool on wire racks. Makes about 24.

BUTTERMILK DROP DOUGHNUTS vegetable oil

2 cups all-purpose flour
¼ cup sugar
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. ground nutmeg
½ tsp. baking soda
¼ cup vegetable oil
¾ cup buttermilk
1 egg
sugar or cinnamon sugar

Heat oil (2 to 3 inches) in Dutch oven to 375. Mix flour, sugar, salt, baking powder, nutmeg and baking soda in large bowl. Add oil, buttermilk and egg; beat with fork until smooth. Drop batter by teaspoonfuls (do not make too large or they will not cook through) into hot oil. Fry about 3 minutes or until golden brown on both sides; drain on paper towels. Immediately roll in sugar. Makes about 3½ dozen.

Chanukah Delights

Kosher meals with a flair for savoir faire

The Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, tests holiday recipes for the Jewish community. They offer the following recipes for Chanukah:

ROASTED RED PEPPER SOUP

2 garlic cloves, minced
2 medium onions, chopped
2 tbsp. oil
4 large roasted red peppers
4 cups chicken or vegetable broth

Sauté garlic and onions in hot oil until soft, about 8 minutes. Set aside.

To roast peppers, broil until they are charred and blistered. Place in a paper bag for a few minutes to cool. Place the peppers in a bowl, pull off the skin, and remove the stems, membranes and seeds. Strain and use the juices for the soup. Puree the peppers; add to soup pot along with the sautéed vegetables and the broth. Heat and serve. Serves 6.

Note: If homemade broth is not available, use powdered flavoured broth. The soup will then be pareve.

POTATO SALAD IN A MOLD

6 medium potatoes
1 celery stalk, chopped
1 carrot, finely sliced
1 tsp. dried dill, finely chopped
½ green, red or orange pepper, finely chopped
4 green onions, thinly sliced
2 tbsp. vinegar
⅓ cup light mayonnaise
1 tbsp. prepared mustard

Garnishes
¼ cup chopped flat leaf parsley
3 hard-boiled eggs, quartered
paprika

Boil potatoes in jackets in salted water until just tender (do not overcook). Drain, cool, peel and dice. Combine with remaining ingredients. Transfer to greased mold, chill. Unmold on a plate lined with greens. Garnish with parsley, top with hardboiled eggs and sprinkle with paprika. Serve at room temperature. Serves 6-8.

BALSAMIC MARINATED CHICKEN ON SALAD

6 boneless, skinless chicken breasts

Marinade
⅓ cup balsamic vinegar
1 tsp. dried oregano
1 tsp. dried basil
¼ tsp. dried rosemary
2 garlic cloves, minced
3 tbsp. olive oil
3 tbsp. kosher white wine
3 tsp. soy sauce
3 tsp. Dijon style mustard
1 medium onion, finely chopped

Place the chicken and marinade ingredients in a large bowl or plastic bag. Coat all the ingredients with the marinade and refrigerate for 2 hours.

Salad
½ lb. snow peas
½ lb. yellow string beans
1 small red onion, thinly sliced
½ lb. mushrooms, sliced
1 head Boston lettuce, washed and torn
¼ cup Italian salad dressing or your favourite dressing
2 tomatoes garnished, quartered

Preheat oven to 400F (200C).

Place the chicken breasts in a baking dish. Drizzle with the marinade; cover with foil and bake for 25 to 30 minutes or until done. Remove from baking dish and place on a carving board. Slice into thin strips. Set aside.

String the snow peas; blanch in boiling water for 2 minutes. Drain and rinse under cold water; dry thoroughly and set aside. Cook yellow beans in boiling water for 5 minutes. Rinse under cold water; dry thoroughly and cut into 1-in. pieces.

In a salad bowl, combine all the salad ingredients and add the dressing. Toss well. Place the chicken strips on top of the salad ingredients. Garnish with the quartered tomatoes. Serves 6-8.

Italian Dressing
½ cup salad oil
½ cup olive oil
¼ cup vinegar
1 clove garlic, minced

Combine all ingredients in a screw-top jar. Cover and shake well. Chill before serving. Yield: 1¼ cups.

Food evokes memories of mothers' kitchens

By RAHEL MUSLEAH
Special to The CJN

I am 42 years old, and my mother is still bringing me food. Every time she visits, she comes bearing favourite dishes from my Indian-Iraqi-Syrian Jewish background: cheese samoosas – flaky pastries stuffed with cheese; containers of hulbah – a thick, intensely green sauce made of cilantro leaves and fenugreek seeds; bhajees of all kinds – curries of cabbage, carrots and lentils, of spinach, potatoes and chick peas.

My most visceral memories of Shabbat and holidays revolve around my mother's kitchen. I can almost hear the oil bubbling as she stirs round golden potatoes in a wok-like pot we brought all the way from India to make a specialty called aloomakalas. I see her ladling the potatoes into a dish, carefully draining the oil, while my two sisters and I wait impatiently to sample one each. I feel the steam rising as I break open the crust, crisp on the outside, white and fluffy inside, and I have to wait still another moment so I don't burn my tongue. And then I close my eyes and savour each bite, treasuring the complex simplicity of crunch and tenderness together.

I learned about Moroccan, Kurdish and Iraqi Jews

I smell the lemon, salt and cilantro she adds to the tomato chutney that remains the perennial appetizer at our Shabbat dinners. I feel the silky onion skins, parboiled and ready to be stuffed with rice and chopped chicken to make mahashas. I watch as she prepares kishmish badam (our version of rosinkes mit mandlen) to crown the saffron-yellow rice pilau, sauteing slivered almonds until they turn the colour of a faultless suntan, and raisins until they lose their wrinkles and puff up into smooth balls. Most of all, I see my mother stirring, whirring, blending and mixing her recipe for love – food. It is her way of nurturing our Jewish spirit.

Food. The word and all it signifies would no doubt provoke a host of ambivalent responses in any group of American Jewish women today, loaded with concerns about dieting, body image, eating disorders, and of course, lack of time to cook. On the positive side of the scale, however, food represents much that is good – emotional, physical and spiritual sustenance, a means of self-expression and creativity. Food is a primary and value-laden ingredient in Judaism; no celebration is complete without it.

Minimally, food embodies identity: If gefilte fish is traditional in your home, you are probably not a Libyan Jew. If comfort food means burekas and baklava, your origins are probably not Russian. "Food is history, geography, anthropology, oral history," says Joan Nathan, author of seven Jewish cookbooks.

"It brings up memories of the past, and what makes your family different from others. When you cook special foods, you connect to family, God and history – all through your hands."

Nathan discovered the vast scope of Jewish cuisine in Israel, when she worked for Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek. "Until then," she says, "Jewish food was my mother's chicken soup and matzah balls. My family was Polish, Hungarian and German. I learned about Moroccan Jews, Kurdish and Iraqi Jews. The whole world opened up to me."

Mollie Katzen, author of the Moosewood and other vegetarian cookbooks, recalls helping her mother prepare on Friday mornings for Shabbat.

It was the only time her mother really cooked: she spent the morning baking desserts and challah. "By the time we served everything, the house was clean, quiet and transformed. The whole thing seemed so magical. I felt the holiness deeply."

Judaism, in fact, nourished some of Katzen's formative memories and shaped her attitude toward food. Judaism taught her a "reverence for food and a consciousness of its coming from nature. The first prayers I learned – without even knowing what they meant– were all about being grateful for food."

Like the sensual aroma of a freshly baked challah wafting between the generations, food represents a potent "symbol of continuity to a migrating, wandering people," says Claudia Roden, author of The Book of Jewish Food: An Odyssey from Samarkand to New York, which won a James Beard award in 1997.

"It is a way of remembering generations past and vanished worlds. It is about roots and identity."

Roden was born in Zamalek, a district of Cairo, to a family of Syrian ancestry. When she cooks family dishes, she says, "every smell, every flavour brings back memories of my mother and my aunts, and the friends whose hospitality we enjoyed. Behind every dish is the story of life in a far-off town or village long ago. Researching the dishes was my way of discovering the story of my family and the story of the Diaspora."

EGGPLANT LATKES

6 baby eggplants cut in ½ in. slices
¼ cup flour
3 eggs, beaten with 3 tbsp. dry or semi dry kosher wine oil for frying
1½ cups bread or cracker crumbs
dash salt, pepper, garlic powder (optional)

Sprinkle both sides of eggplant slices with salt. Let stand 20 minutes. Rinse and pat dry on paper towels to remove excess moisture. Dip each slice in flour, shaking off excess. Dip each slice in egg/wine mixture, then in bread or cracker crumbs. Sprinkle with salt, pepper and garlic powder.

Deep fried: Heat oil in a deep, heavy pot. Fry slices in batches until golden brown. Drain on absorbent paper. Serve warm. If desired, dip in chili sauce, soy sauce or teriyaki sauce.

Broiled: Heat oven to broil. Place slices on foil lined baking sheet, lightly greased. Broil for 5 minutes or until golden. Turn and broil other side until golden. Watch carefully. Yield: 18 or more latkes.

Note: To make ahead – refrigerate coated eggplant slices for about 2 hours. Fry just before serving.

CHOCOLATE KISS COOKIES

3 egg whites (room temperature)
½ tsp. kosher cream of tartar
1 cup sugar
2 tbsp. cocoa, sifted

Preheat oven to 325F (160C).

Beat egg whites until foamy; add the cream of tartar and heat until soft peaks form. Continue beating while adding the sugar slowly. Beat until stiff peaks form but the egg whites are glossy. By hand, gently fold in the cocoa. Using a scant teaspoon for each kiss, spoon the kisses on a parchment or foil lined baking sheet. Set them 1 inch apart as they will spread. Bake for 20 minutes or until they seem dry. Cool before removing from pan. Store in a dry, airtight cookie jar. They will keep for about a week.

Note: All vinegars need kosher certification.

Chanukah Delights

The Egypt Roden knew was a cosmopolitan, French-speaking country where the Jewish community had a "happy and important place in the mosaic of minorities." When her family left Egypt as a result of Egypt's war with Israel in 1956, they sustained a deep feeling of loss, but cooking was a piece of their cultural heritage they could save to pass on to their children.

In fact, says Roden, who lives in London, in an immigrant culture cooking usually survives the longest, even when clothing, music, language and religious observance have been abandoned.

"Although cooking is fragile because it lives in human activity, it isn't easily destroyed," she says. "It is transmitted in the family like genes, and it has the capacity for change and for passing on new experience from one generation to another."

Sometimes, though, women have used food to demonstrate their acceptance of a new culture. Marcie Cohen Ferris, a museum educator who is studying southern Jewish women's food habits, notes that southern Jewish women "constructed braided identities, regional and religious," through food, an area over which they had control.

While women made their grandmothers' recipes for Romanian eggplant salad and apple strudel, they also blended in classic southern cookery.

In New Orleans, kosher families substituted chicken for the shrimp in jambalaya, says Ferris, who grew up in Blytheville, Ark., and now lives in Washington, D.C. Friday night dinners often featured fried chicken, okra, black-eyed peas, yams and turnip greens. Breakfast could include salt herring and grits, side by side. Recipes also passed back and forth between Jewish women and the black nannies, housekeepers and cooks they employed.

The heady intersection between food and memory has given rise to a spate of new cookbooks flavoured with personal reminiscences. Memoirs and cookbooks have become popular, because as communities have left old homelands, culinary traditions are in danger of disappearing, says Roden.

In Miriam's Kitchen (Viking), a poignant memoir scented with fried onions and lost worlds, Elizabeth Ehrlich reclaims tradition as she discovers the secrets of potato pancakes and savoury Shabbat puddings in her mother-in-law's kitchen, which reminds her of her grandmothers' kitchens she loved as a child.

A Holocaust survivor, Miriam shares a legacy of stories and recipes, helping Ehrlich connect the wisdom of the past with the present. "It's discipline, a kosher kitchen," Ehrlich writes. "It is an encompassing way of life, in which discipline and meaning, the mundane and the spiritual, are inextricably tied. You are only washing dishes, but you are doing something more. You are tending something ancient, and it matters."

In Memory's Kitchen: A Legacy From the Women of Terezin, Cara De Silva (Jason Aronson), gathers the recipes that Mina Pachter and her friends compiled in the Nazi "showcamp" of Theresienstadt as a way of defying the Nazis and preserving their identities. In the stark absence of real nourishment, the women recreated lavish holiday meals of chicken, goulash, noodle kugel and cake.

> Sometimes, though, women have used food to demonstrate their acceptance of a new culture

Centuries earlier, conversos in the Spanish Inquisition held onto Jewish culinary practices even when it threatened their physical survival, because it was crucial to their spiritual survival. One hundred recipes are documented in A Drizzle of Honey – The Lives and Recipes of Spain's Secret Jews, a 1999 National Book Award winner by David Gitlitz and Linda Kay Davidson (St. Martin's).

For some Jewish women, invested over the ages in nurturing their families, cooking – that most practical of all religious spheres – is a deeply sacred act.

Nathan describes Sephardic women who wash rice seven times for Passover so it is as clean as possible, and Lubavitch women who peel strawberries before they use them for Passover because they fear chametz may have touched the fruit. This extra work is their way of turning the profane into the sacred.

In my own kitchen, preparing for the sacred tends to collide with the profane. In the midst of creating a delectable holiday meal, as the kitchen is fragrant with cardamom and cumin, my kids ask for pizza. Later, I know they will savour the aloomakalas, rice pilau, and cake-like carrot pudding, and I hope the love I blended into the food will always flavour their memories of my kitchen.

Rahel Musleah is the author of Why On This Night? A Passover Haggadah for Family Celebration (Simon & Schuster). She presents programs on the Jewish communities of India, where she was born.

It's the end of an era as Seagram's closes shop

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The heart is more stubborn than the mind, said a subdued Edgar Bronfman Jr., at the final annual meeting of Seagram's, in trying to express the emotional wrench his family went through in letting the Montreal-headquartered company disappear.

In the end, though, reason prevailed over sentiment, he indicated, in explaining why Seagram, the distilling empire founded by his grandfather Sam, over 70 years ago, is officially merging with, but effectively being taken over by, the French entertainment and media giant, Vivendi.

"It's not easy letting go of so much of our past, and none of us – myself, my father Edgar, my uncle Charles, my brother Sam – have taken this decision lightly.

"It's not been without a great deal of emotion, as a third-generation Bronfman and the third to lead the company. It's been particularly difficult to make dispassionate decisions about a company that has been so integral to my family's life."

What will produce the best return for shareholders, he said, was what clinched the decision, announced last June.

Clichés like "end of an era" and "historic" came easily to the lips of Seagram shareholders as they gathered for the last time. Nevertheless, they voted 90 percent for the merger of Seagram, Vivendi, and Canal+, Europe's leading pay TV company into the new Vivendi Universal.

For the Jewish community, first the departure of Charles to New York in 1997, and now the passing into oblivion of Seagram, a name that inspired pride and nostalgia for a time when its legendary chief was the community's patriarch, it is a reminder that things will never be the way they were.

The meeting itself was as brief as could be, the atmosphere sober.

Charles and Edgar Sr. sticking to the business at hand, announced without comment the overwhelming approval. There was not even a glass of V.O. to toast the occasion, in constrast to the champagne that flowed at the Vivendi shareholders' meeting at the Louvre the same day.

"My father and uncle felt a matter-of-fact meeting was called for; this was neither a time to trumpet our history or celebrate the future," Edgar Jr. said later to the press.

In response to shareholder Allan Raymond, who felt more ceremony would have been appropriate, Bronfman replied, "I'm not sure a longer meeting would have shown more respect. We are proud of our eight decades of association with Montreal and [our] contribution to the city...We hope that commitment will live on."

Edgar Jr., 45, who will be Vivendi Universal's vice-chair, the number two position, said the merger is consistent with the path he took Seagram on since he became CEO in 1994. He has transformed the company's focus to entertainment, with wine and spirits representing an ever-diminishing relative source of revenue.

The Universal Music Group and Universal Studios were among the major acquisitions made by Bronfman. Cable TV and theme parks also became a big part of Seagram's, with the newest to open in Osaka, Japan, next spring.

The original liquor division, still profitable, is for sale.

"The formation of this new company actually represents the culmination of Seagram's previously announced strategy to transform itself into a global media and entertainment company," he said.

"Vivendi Universal offers shareholders tremendous growth prospects – stronger growth than Vivendi, Seagram or Canal+ could have achieved as stand-alone businesses...Vivendi Universal has the capacity to bring together a diverse array of entertainment and information, and make it available to consumers anywhere, at any time, over any device or platform, in both the wired and wireless world."

Combined revenues are a projected 24.6 billion euros this year.

"Even before the Time Warner/AOL deal was announced at the beginning of this year, it was becoming quite obvious to me that, in order to create value for our shareholders in the future, we would have to look at new business opportunities – a partner, a joint venture, an alliance, a merger. Why?

"Because it was clear that the communications and media industries were being reshaped significantly by the convergence of entertainment, telecommunications, computers and mobile devices."

The fate of the Seagram's head office, the chateau-like edifice on Peel Street, and other real estate here is not known at this point, nor is that of local Seagram employees.

The property is now the assets of Vivendi Universal, Bronfman said, and most of the employees work in the liquor division, so what will happen to them depends on who buys it.

The younger Bronfman withstood severe criticism in the media for his foray into entertainment, a business far more fickle than booze.

Even within the family there was uncertainty. Edgar Sr. wrote in his memoirs that his brother Charles was not comfortable with his nephew's takeover $5.7-billion takeover of Hollywood's MCA Inc. in 1995.

But at Seagram's annual meeting last year, Charles gave his nephew a hearty endorsement. "I congratulate you for the courageous and professional way you are leading this company. You are doing a helluva job."

Bronfmans will occupy five of the 18 seats on Vivendi Universal's board of directors.

Today, Edgar Jr. feels vindicated. "Everything new starts with a mess. But I have proven I know how to manage film, TV, parks, recorded music...Each move has proven to be a sound decision."

New ambassador welcomed in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The new Israeli ambassador to Canada says the "international community is rewarding Arafat for deserting the peace track" when it condemns Israel at the United Nations Security Council.

"In the future, when he is not happy with the negotiations, he knows he can resort to violence and will enjoy the sympathy of the international community and it will put pressure on us," Haim Divon told a luncheon at FEDERATION CJA, attended by about 200 organizational leaders and rabbis.

It was Divon's first formal introduction to the Montreal community since arriving in October.

Canada's voting pattern on the Arab-Israeli conflict at the UN has been "a blow," Divon said, but an "outcry" from the Jewish community can have an effect. He asked the community to work closely with the embassy in trying to get Israel's message across.

"It used to be we saw hasbara [roughly, public relations] as an important element, but an add-on, a side dish. Now it is the main dish," said Divon, who was a former political adviser to Yossi Beilin, when he was deputy foreign minister.

Divon said the conflict with the Palestinians has become a war of images, a battle he concedes Israel is currently losing because of the power of television. Few people are interested in reading in-depth articles to gain a better understanding of the background.

He sees his job as "bringing the international community to its senses." In Canada, he intends to "systematically" work with organizations and the media to make Israel's case. This is Divon's second posting in Canada; he was a consul in Toronto from 1981-83, during the heated days of the conflict in Lebanon.

Disappointed though he may be in the Canadian government's recent UN activity, Divon said, "I am much better off than my colleagues in Europe."

Only 2 ½ months ago, Israel was "the darling" of the world, he said.

"Everyone was praising our commitment to peace and the bold steps the government was willing to take. Even the Americans were surprised how far Barak was going, even discussing Jerusalem and the right of return.

"Suddenly, everything is shattered, and not because Israel changed its policy or went back on peace, but exactly the other way around. Arafat decided for his own objectives to reverse the track we all agreed on."

Divon suggested it was because Arafat was not happy with the sympathy Israel was receiving or the expectations that he match Israel's moves..

Divon termed Arafat's use of violence as a "calculated and clever move" to get the world to see Israel as the aggressors, and thereby regain sympathy for the Palestinians.

Divon said Israel prefers peace, but "at the same time, is determined to defend itself in the way we know how. We do not want our willingness for peace translated as a sign of weakness."

Representatives of each of the sponsoring organizations of the luncheon pledged their support for Israel and willingness to work with the ambassador.

Several also spoke of their disappointment in Canada's UN voting.

"These are truly difficult times for Israel and the Jewish people," said FEDERATION CJA first vice-president Steven Cummings. "You can count on our continued support of our dear Israel, in its times of travail and glory."

Canada-Israel Committee Quebec chair Thomas Hecht said he wants to work with Divon to see that Canada "does a revision" of its policy, a remark that received applause.

"Canada must be an honest broker, not blindly follow the litany of condemnations."

In loving memory of LAURIE BERMAN ז"ל

The entire Boys Town Jerusalem family mourns the untimely passing of Laurie (Chaim Leibish) Berman. Just as G-d is kind, caring, compassionate, forgiving...so was Laurie, fulfilling the dictum of d'vaykus to HaShem, clinging to G-d by following in His ways. Laurie was a pure and holy neshama who forever touched the lives of all who were privileged to know him. While the years we were blessed to have Laurie with us in the land of the living were painfully short, the lessons he taught us through his exemplary ahavas ha'briyos and chesed will remain with us as a lasting inspiration. From Jerusalem, to Laurie's loving parents, our most cherished firiends, Joe and Helen Berman, his devoted ezer ki'negdo, Jackie, his wonderful children, Michael, Aaron, Nancy and Marnie, and the entire family, we offer our heartfelt condolences. *Hamakom yinachem eschem b'soch shaar aveilay Tzion v'Yerushalayim. Israel's legitimacy core of Mideast conflict: Cotler

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The core of the conflict in the Middle East has been, and continues to be, the unwillingness of the Arabs to accept the legitimacy of Israel as a Jewish state, says McGill University Prof. Irwin Cotler.

The conflict is not about territory, about land, about resources or even about Jerusalem, although each of these forms part of the conflict, says Cotler.

He was speaking at the recent Negev Dinner in honour of Herb Gray, deputy prime minister and MP for Windsor West.

Cotler said he had planned to speak about human rights but felt he would be remiss in not speaking about the Middle East.

"The issue is about legitimacy, identity, and the right of the Jewish people to live in secure and recognized boundaries," said Cotler.

Acknowledging the discrimination against Israel from all sides, Cotler urged the audience to "learn the case and spread the word in order to educate others about Israel's legitimate claims.

"I ask each of you, at some point in the next year, to try to sensitize 10 non-Jews to a better understanding of the Jewish cause."

Gray, the longest serving member of Parliament – he was first elected in 1962 – was first honoured at a Negev Dinner, 20 years ago in his hometown of Windsor.

"This was my 13th election in a row – my bar mitzvah election," said Gray.

The dinner, held at Congregation Machzikei Hadas, was co-chaired by former honourees Dr. Norman Barwin and Rabbi Reuven Bulka.

Members of Parliament, senators, local councillors and other dignitaries were in attendance, as well as representatives of various Jewish organizations and institutions. Ambassador Haim Divon brought greetings from the State of Israel.

Mark Klyman, Mark Mendelson and Shaul Kochavi, on behalf of JNF Canada, presented the Bernard M. Bloomfield Medal for Exceptional Service to Laura Greenberg, a longtime volunteer who has recently moved to Toronto.

Funds raised at the Negev Dinner will be used to develop Havaya Plus, a playground for disabled children in the Centre for Development of Intra-Family Communication at Kibbutz Magen in the Western Negev Desert.

After the elections, a commentary

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

In his concession speech following the election, Stockwell Day bravely declared that November 28 represents the "first day of the next election campaign."

As an ironic aside, his comments seem to confirm the widely held, albeit, cynical belief that a politician's first task following a victory is to begin the re-election campaign! But we digress.

Now that the election is over, perhaps we could risk some commentary regarding the various political parties and the Jewish community.

What should politicians and community leaders do to ensure meaningful, mutually constructive and beneficial relations?

The Liberals won the election and the overwhelming support of the Jewish community. To their mutual credit, efforts within both the party and the community to move beyond the tensions that surfaced during the campaign continue even though, strictly speaking, the government could safely ignore Jewish leadership for a while. Liberals, both elected and backroom, are reaching out to smooth over problems connected to UN votes.

That aside, individual aspirants to the not-yet-vacant corner office in Centre Block (i.e., the PMO) will have to work a bit harder to secure Jewish backing for leadership bids down the road.

The Canadian Alliance remains an enigma for much of the Jewish community. There is a growing sense that maybe it wasn't all election hype and there is a critical mass of mutual interest.

However disappointing the election results in Ontario may have been for the Alliance, Stockwell Day can point to a growing number of Jews who have expressed comfort in situating their feet and their pocketbooks in the Alliance camp.

On the other hand, the fears of some dark, inherent streak of intolerance and anti-Semitism just won't entirely disappear.

It would serve the Alliance well to maintain its intensive interest in the Jewish community over the next couple of years with the hope that increased familiarity will help dispel those fears, assuming they aren't justified.

(Next week, we look at the state of relations between the Jewish community and the three other federal parties.)

Aliyah project aims to revitalize Zionist movement

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jared Matas and Robin Merkel are used to fielding questions about their plans.

The friends and Habonim Dror alumni are making aliyah Dec. 30, at a time when ongoing violence in Israel has caused some people to rethink plans just to visit, let alone move there.

Not to mention that they're going as part of a group of 11 to an "urban kibbutz," an arrangement that puts a new spin on an old idea, although there have been at least two other urban kibbutzim in Israel.

Matas and Merkel are headed for Kvutsat Yovel, whose members – all olim from Australia, Britain and North America – will live in a Jerusalem apartment building and work at outside jobs, instead of running a more typical rural agricultural endeavour.

Although Habonim Dror does not exist as a youth movement in Israel, it maintains an office there and has a sister youth movement, HaNoar HaOved v'HaLomed.

Kvutsat Yovel members will share property and earnings, and make decisions by consensus. They will live in separate apartments, but will share a communal living room and activity room.

Like the other urban kibbutzniks, Matas, 25, wants to "work for change" in Israel rather than "sitting on the sidelines here in North America... There are a lot of progressive values which I feel the Jewish state should be embodying."

He is particularly interested in the relationship between Jews and Arabs, although he said the group members would like to become involved in a broad range of issues.

In light of the recent conflict in Israel, Matas – who recently completed a two-year term as national director of Habonim Dror North America – feels it's "all the more important for us to be there."

He has found most of his family and friends supportive, albeit "a bit concerned about security."

A native of Winnipeg who moved to Vancouver at age 13, Matas (a nephew of Winnipeg human-rights lawyer David Matas and a cousin to Winnipeg author Carol Matas) was imbued with a deep connection to Israel growing up in the Labour Zionist youth movement, he said in a recent interview from his home in New York.

He is an alumnus of the movement's Camp Miriam in British Columbia, and spent a year in Israel on Workshop, Habonim Dror's post high school program before pursuing a BA in political science at the University of Toronto.

The idea of creating an urban kibbutz garin (a group that goes to Israel to establish a kibbutz, first popularized in the 1930s) was proposed at a North American Habonim Dror conference two years ago, and a target aliyah date was set for the year 2000. As of last week, five members were already in Israel.

The project is, in part, an effort to revitalize the Zionist movement in North America, according to a news release. It's the first Habonim Dror garin from North America, and perhaps from the English-speaking world, since 1987, said Merkel.

The 23-year-old computer programmer never really considered changing his plans, he said in a phone interview from his native Vancouver. His family has been supportive, he noted, but after violence erupted in Israel, people started asking him if he was still going ahead with the move.

He's been so busy preparing for aliyah, as well as working, that he hasn't had time to become very nervous or excited, he said.

A graduate of McGill University where he co-ran an Arab-Jewish dialogue group, Merkel, like Matas, attended Camp Miriam and the one-year program in Israel. Merkel has also worked at other Habonim Dror camps in Canada and the United States.

The traditional socialist values upon which kibbutzim were established are "just as true today as they were when the state was founded," Matas said.

Anyone interested in joining the kibbutz can find more information at www.kvutsatyovel.com.

Why?

JVS (Jewish Vocational Service) employees have now been on strike since Oct. 28. At the heart of this workplace dispute are two key issues:

1) Management's desire to open the agency during Jewish holidays
(It has closed for all Jewish Holidays since its inception in 1947.)

2) Poor Salaries. Some departments have professional staff who are being paid up to 50% less than their colleagues in similar agencies.

Behind the Issues:

- Accepted labour standards dictate that the ratio of staff to managers should average 10:1 The JVS ratio is 4:1.
- Miscellaneous expenditures went from $32,602 in 1997 to $139,045 in 2000.
- Salaries in 1997 (including management) totalled $2,857,596. Salaries in 2000 totalled $3,837,276 – an increase of 34%. Salaries for unionized employees, meanwhile, went up by 4%.
- An Unfair Labour Practice charge has been filed against JVS management with the Ontario Labour Relations Board, after they spent hundreds of dollars on letters sent to employees to intimidate them.
- Since the strike began, management has hired security at a cost of about $3,500 per week.

All of this has been done by a management which claims there is no money.

It's time JVS worked for its employees!

Barrie's Jews raise funds for city's first synagogue

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Jewish community in Barrie, which has grown to 100 families, has already raised $100,000 from its own members to build the city's first synagogue.

"We hope it will be a rallying point and attract more Jews to Barrie so that we will have 200 to 300 families," said Eric Allen, executive member of the Simcoe County Jewish Association.

Last July, The CJN reported that a Torah was donated to the Barrie community by B'nai Tikvah Congregation in Niagara Falls.

After that article was published, the Barrie community was given a beautifully treed 1.3 acre site in south Barrie by a Toronto developer.

It will be the site of the new synagogue. Construction is expected to be completed in a year or two.

The new synagogue, as yet unnamed, will be a Reform congregation. It will be 4,000 to 5,000 square feet, including a Hebrew school, a social hall and a small library, and will cost an estimated $500,000 to $600,000.

The synagogue will be designed for free by architect Cliff Korman, Toronto, who designed the new Ritz Carlton hotel.

"We are beginning our fund-raising drive in earnest in the new year and we hope Jews in Toronto and other places will respond," said Allen.

Barrie's current Hebrew school, which rents quarters in the local YMCA, has doubled in size in recent years, he said.

The High Holy Day services, which are also held in rented space, attract Jewish cottagers in the area, in addition to a significant number of Jews who work in Toronto but live in Barrie. At the last Yom Kippur services, for example, 150 people attended.

The new synagogue will serve this rapidly growing region. The Simcoe County Jewish Association also has members living in Collingwood, Gravenhurst and other towns.

Barrie itself is growing at the rate of 5,000 people a year and now has a population of 100,000, Allen said.

"Jewish people settle here for the same reasons as other people – more inexpensive housing and a better lifestyle."

The Association's most recent fund-raiser – their largest yet, attracting 1,000 people – was a night of music called Festival of Lights on Nov. 25 at the Barrie Central High School auditorium. Among the musicians lending their talents were an all-female choir, Bravado, the Janet French jazz trio, as well as Col. Chris Hadfield, the guest of honour, Dave Hadfield as well as a musician who headed the fundraising committee for the event.

If you are interested in helping build the new synagogue, call Allen at (705) 725-8103.

Enhance French language, not laws: B'nai Brith

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — French in Quebec is in a healthy state and while it deserves to be promoted, it must not be at the expense of the province's anglophone minorities, other minorities or a Jewish community that has seen the "disappearance of a generation," B'nai Brith said in a brief last week to the controversial Estates General on Language commission.

B'nai Brith, Quebec Region's (BBQ) League for Human Rights submission – excerpts of which were due to be presented Dec. 13 – was made despite the organization's concerns and widespread perception that the findings of the commission will be in favour of toughening the province's language laws.

"This Estates General on Language could go down in history for exemplary integrity if it cast off the manifest political baggage attending its birth and declared itself in favour of absolute respect for all citizens, no matter their maternal tongue," the brief stated.

"It would be more effective if you pointed out the successes and increase in usage of the French language, versus the impression that the decision to hold the Estates General was made solely on the basis that the government is planning to toughen the language laws."

Indeed, the brief, while repeatedly affirming the need to maintain the "vitality" of French in the province, contained criticisms and recommendations with respect to the negative impact of Quebec's exclusionary and "coercive" language policies on English-speaking communities, the Jewish community and other minorities.

The League said any toughening of the "noose" of current language laws – especially if implemented to "appease" marginal intolerant and extremist elements within the nationalist movement – would subject Quebec to ridicule abroad, revive tensions within the province and make Quebec incapable of "meeting the challenges of the new millennium."

The brief said a reason for the continued Jewish migration from Quebec is due to "mixed signals" from Quebec nationalists and separatists to anglophone Jewish youth that "they will not be welcome in the new Quebec."

"For every politician who will blithely state that we are the 'best-treated minority' in Quebec," the League said, "others can point how badly under-represented the Jewish community is in the public sector and government service."

The League recommended, among other things, increasing immigrants' access to English schools; lowering the eligibility threshold for bilingual municipal and health care institutional services for non-francophones from 50 percent to 25 percent; improving the quality of written and spoken French taught in French schools; and allowing equal-sized lettering for languages other than French on commercial signs.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, is planning to deliver its own brief in March.

Depression said more common among seniors

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Major depression is twice as common among seniors as it is in younger people, says Dr. Susan Lieff, consulting psychiatrist at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

A total of 12 percent of elderly people, including those in nursing homes, suffer from major depression, she said in a recent talk that was part of the Ada Starkman lecture series.

"We don't know what causes depression; it's a combination of psychological, biological and social factors."

But the stigma attached to mental illness prevents victims from getting the treatment they need, she said.

Medications that alter the brain chemistry are the best bet for seniors with depression, while psychotherapy is often of little use, she said.

However, she added, when medications are used, you can "take your pick of the drugs, no one [medication] is superior. Choose the one whose side effects are most tolerable."

Lieff, who has been treating seniors for 15 years, recommended that people who suspect they are depressed should see their family doctor first, asking for an appointment long enough to give them a chance to talk about their worries.

"The 10-minute visit won't do. I'm sure the nurse or receptionist will arrange a longer time."

Stubborn cases often respond better to electric shock treatment (ECT) than they do to medication, and recent advances have taken ECT beyond the application in One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, she said.

With people living longer lives, she sees patients now in their 80s or 90s – "I even see one who is 100" – rather than in their 70s, as she used to.

She said there is a myth that people who suffer from depression are "weak persons or too sensitive."

Financial worries are frequently the cause of depression among seniors, with those in lower socio-economic classes suffering from the illness more often than those better off, she said.

"Some who come from a different culture may have the symptoms but may not be able to say they are depressed. Generally, seniors in a depressed mood show a loss of interest in pleasure. And the pleasure of enjoying their grandchildren is the last to go."

Among the symptoms of depression are appetite and sleep disturbances, psychomotor agitation, diminished ability to think or concentrate and recurrent thoughts of death. In the elderly, irritability, pessimism, clinging, preoccupation with physical ills and fixed beliefs may be important signs.

From 25 to 40 percent of family caregivers looking after someone with a serious illness suffer from depression, she said.

People who have retired and don't know what to do with themselves are also high on the list.

Only serious heart cases take up more hospital beds than depression, and only arthritis patients have more pain, Lieff said.

She advised her audience to get involved in the treatment of their family or friends.

They can't lie in bed and worry, she said. They have to get up and sit in a chair.

But she cautioned that behaviour modification is not suitable for all patients.

Mark Gryfe, president of the Baycrest Foundation, thanked the Beverley and Aaron Black family for sponsoring the lecture. Dr. Len Goodman, of Baycrest's Leadership Development, thanked Barbara Frances for helping to arrange the lecture.

Montreal's Mount Sinai launches two new services despite cutbacks

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mount Sinai Hospital centre president Elliot Bier announced two new services soon to begin, despite continuing financial constraints.

A palliative home-care program and an asthma management centre have been launched entirely with privately raised money. MSH is also in the rare position among Quebec hospitals in having ended the 1999-2000 fiscal years with a $879,196 surplus.

The home-care program will seek to ensure that terminally ill patients receive the services they need to remain at home as long as possible or even, with the proper support, die at home.

"Research has shown that many terminally ill patients would prefer to stay in their homes surrounded by family and friends rather than be admitted to the hospital," said Bier.

The program, which will be available in a few months, will complement services now offered by CLSCs, the Victorian Order of Nurses and other institutions. MSH doctors and physio- and occupational therapists are expected to fill the gaps.

Home care is likely to reduce demand on MSH's 15 palliative-care beds, for which there is a waiting list, Bier said. "Furthermore, certain resources can be provided more cost-efficiently at home rather than in hospital."

The asthma centre, which will open at the beginning of 2001, will offer adults with the condition diagnosis, treatment, education and follow-up from a multidisciplinary team.

"One of the main goals of the centre is to teach asthmatics more about the disease," said pneumology chief Dr. Norman Wolkove. "Patients will learn how to use their medications properly, especially their inhalers, and how to avoid environmental triggers like pollen, chemicals, dust and pet dander, which may be aggravating their asthma. (MSH) will also provide a comprehensive followup program to ensure the long-term control of the disease."

Wolkove said that many of the approximately 500 deaths in Canada from asthmatic attacks could have been prevented.

The asthma centre will also be a research site.

Bier said the centre should save the health-care system money by reducing the number of visits asthmatics make to emergency rooms and days spent in hospital.

MSH, founded by the Jewish community in 1909 in the Laurentians as a small tuberculosis sanitarium, has been located in Côte St. Luc for 10 years. Of its 107 beds, 35 are for short-term respiratory disease care, 57 for general chronic care, and 15 for palliative care.

At a press conference held at MSH MP Irwin Cotler said "The federal government has to enhance funding… The $35 billion restored since 1999 is not enough. Going back to where we were in 1993-94 is not enough."

Screening helps prevent colorectal cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Victims of colorectal cancer, cancer of the colon and rectum, have a 90 percent chance of surviving for at least five years when the disease is detected and treated early.

The survival rate drops to 10 percent if it is not caught until its advanced stage.

More to the point, a media release from The Colorectal Cancer Screening Initiative Foundation quotes experts as estimating that up to 95 percent of all colorectal cancer is preventable with timely, thorough testing.

The Colorectal Cancer Screening Initiative Foundation is conducting a national public awareness campaign to teach people about this disease, and to encourage them to discuss being tested for it with their doctors.

While a small percentage of cases occur in people with identifiable factors – such as family history, or history of irritable bowel syndrome, ulcerative colitis or Crohn's disease – most come from the general population.

It affects men and women of all ages equally, and is the second most prevalent and deadly cancer.

Canada and the United States have among the highest incidents of colorectal cancer in the world.

The insidious nature of colorectal cancer is that there are often no symptoms, or the symptoms are mild or very general, and thus easily ignored.

Besides, many of us feel squeamish about even talking about that part of the body, let alone having something done to it.

The first symptom, the release notes, may be experienced as an acute medical emergency.

Colorectal cancer develops in the parts of the body's digestive system which removes nutrients from food, and stores waste until it passes out of the body as feces.

Most colorectal cancers develop from benign polyps on the inner wall of the colorectum, the release explains. Early removal of these polyps, then, is essential.

There are four tests for colorectal cancer; the fecal occult blood test, flexible sigmoidoscopy, double contrast barium enema, and colonoscopy.

While no one would call these tests by any means pleasant, their use is of proven benefit.

While there is no research to prove any particular way to prevent the polyps or cancer from starting, the suggestion is that adopting a lifestyle that protects against disease generally is wise – such as the consumption of five to 10 helpings of vegetables and fruits each day, being physically active, and having an adequate calcium and folic acid intake.

Netanyahu's candidacy bid unites opponents

Assessments made by legal experts in the Knesset hold that there is little chance that the Basic Law will be changed in time. Any such changes must pass through four readings in the Knesset, the last three requiring majorities of at least 61 MKs. This is considered unlikely in the foreseeable future.

Likud MK Yuval Steinitz, who initiated the bill calling for changes to the Basic Law, said yesterday that he intends to appeal to the High Court of Justice against what he termed "an anti-democratic situation."

However, prior to Barak's surprising announcement, a bill for the dissolution of the Knesset had already passed a preliminary reading, and general elections were in the process of being arranged for May 2001. If the MKs opt to pass the bill into law, dissolving the Knesset, then general elections for parliament and for prime minister will be held.

Netanyahu would be eligible to participate in those elections.

A final option appears highly unlikely, given the decision made Sunday by the Knesset legal adviser, Tzvi Inbar, to bar Herut MK Michael Kleiner's non-confidence motion. However, if the motion should pass, general elections will be held in 90 days.

Kleiner said Sunday that he disagrees with Inbar's opinion and warned that he will appeal to the High Court of Justice against the Knesset speaker if he is blocked from submitting his non-confidence motion.

Responding to Netanyahu's announcement last night, Likud chair Ariel Sharon said he welcomes any candidate in the elections. He also vociferously denied allegations of colluding with Barak in expediting the elections so that Netanyahu would be prevented from participating.

Sharon expressed confidence that Likud would win in the upcoming elections and re-iterated his call for the cancellation of the direct election of prime minister and a return to the previous system.

One Israel MK Elie Goldschmidt, chair of the Knesset finance committee, is preparing to initiate deliberations over the funding which treasury will provide for candidates in the special election for prime minister. The estimated budget for the elections currently stands at NIS 350 million

Barak's resignation is "intifadah's triumph"

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Barak's sudden resignation could further derail the battered peace process, said Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat as he returned to the Gaza Strip on Sunday after a trip to Saudi Arabia.

The resignation "means peace talks will stop until the elections are over," Arafat told reporters in Gaza.

"This is not the first time the talks and implementation are delayed."

Earlier, speaking in Riyadh, Arafat declared that Barak's resignation is a result of the Palestinian intifadah.

The Palestinian leader's skepticism about Barak's move was the keynote in a surge of criticism in the Arab world.

A commentator on Syrian state-run Radio Damascus said yesterday that Prime Minister Ehud Barak's resignation is designed exclusively to promote his own political future.

"It's clear that Barak, who submitted his resignation, is looking for an alibi to remain in power," the Syrian commentator said.

"It's clear that spilling Arab blood is the strongest card in this sanguinary bazaar, in which the enemy's leaders vie with one another to display the most extreme, harsh policy," the Syrian commentator continued. "It appears that the one who hates Arabs the most, who kills the most Arabs and demolishes the most homes, will be the one with the greatest chance of success in the elections."

Speaking in Damascus as a participant in the first meeting of a special monitoring committee established at the recent Arab summit, Egypt's Foreign Minister Amr Moussa described the resignation as "an internal Israeli matter."

However, he added, "we take interest in it, since Israel is a side in the Arab-Israeli conflict, and is supposed to be a party in the peace process."

Meanwhile, Egypt's leading daily Al-Ahram expressed concerns that internal political feuding in Israel may prove costly to the Palestinians.

Israel's elections might send the Palestinian-Israel conflict into a new vicious circle, an Al-Ahram editorial said.

In Lebanon, Hezbollah took partial credit on Sunday for Barak's resignation. The resistance group's two decades of fighting in Southern Lebanon, together with the 10-week old Palestinian intifadah, led to Barak's downfall, Hezbollah claimed.

"The Islamic resistance and the intifadah in Palestine were able to lay the foundation for the government collapse in Israel," Nabeel Qaouk, a spokesperson for Hezbollah, said.

In Mecca, Khaled Meshal, the chairman of Hamas' political bureau told Associated Press that Barak's resignation can be attributed directly to the intifadah.

"The intifadah should continue," Meshal said. "It has caused such great confusion among the enemy and brought his downfall."

Jordanian newspapers interpreted Barak's resignation as a sign that conditions for peace in Israel aren't ripe. Ad-Dustour reported on its front page that "the intifadah forced General Barak to go home."

Balancing act at 10 Downing Street

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel has taken a drubbing in the court of public opinion in London: 54 percent of those polled in a public opinion survey conducted by the Daily Telegraph at the end of October thought that Israel had used excessive force against the Palestinians.

Similarly, most of the media in Britain, apart from the Daily Telegraph, believe that Israel is being unwarrantedly tough and brutal.

One body that does not share these views is the British government. Increasingly, it is becoming apparent that London is presently showing greater understanding for the Israeli position than the United States, Turkey, Jordan and other friendly states. Throughout the period of the confrontation with the Palestinians, the British have abstained from issuing one-sided statements and have been careful not to pin the blame on Israel, as French President Jacques Chirac did.

Some in Israel were surprised at this, in the light of the fact that Britain has a vibrant pro-Palestinian lobby and that the Arab world exercises a strong influence on decision makers.

In conversations conducted by Israeli diplomats they learned that if it were strictly up to Britain, it would have abstained on the vote on the sharply worded condemnation of Israel passed by the United Nations Security Council – but that the British had no choice but to go along when it became apparent that the United States was not going to veto the resolution.

But that instance aside, Britain has steadfastly refused to add its voice to the chorus of detractors of Israeli policy. The British maintain that the UN's one-sided stance, led by France and with the encouragement of the Arab states, is undermining the prospects that the world body will be viewed as an honest broker in the Middle East.

The balanced approach taken by Britain is largely due to one person: the prime minister, Tony Blair.

Three factors have contributed in this regard. As a devout Anglican, Blair views Israel as the incarnation of the biblical vision. In public speeches he has stated that he views the Jewish way of life as a paragon for the realization of values such as a cohesive family structure and social involvement and solidarity with the needy. Even before he was elected prime minister, Blair displayed great warmth toward the Jewish community and toward Israel. The Arab world has got used to the idea that Blair has a "weak spot" in regard to Jews, but despite this did not mark him as pro-Israel.

Prior to the 1999 elections in Israel, the Labour party consulted extensively with experts of New Labour, who shared with the Israelis their lessons about the victory they had achieved in the general election of 1997 in Britain. The British party attaches cardinal importance to the cultivation of ties with movements that espouse the same social-democratic ideological platform. To criticize Israel at the present juncture would be tantamount to doing harm to a sister party.

From the experience he acquired during the negotiations on formulating the peace accord in Northern Ireland, Blair learned that in political conflicts where deep-rooted religious elements are involved there is no black-and-white reality and that the road to bridging the differences is, unfortunately, strewn with manifestations of violence.

With the backing of his foreign secretary, Robin Cook, Blair, who is now enjoying a renewed surge of popularity in the polls, dictated a consistent, balanced foreign policy based on a view of the long-term needs of the parties to the conflict and deriving the current diplomatic solutions. At the prime minister's behest, an approach took root of not levelling one-sided accusations and of aspiring to help in whatever way possible – whether this involves logistic aid or conveying diplomatic messages – to achieve a settlement in the Middle East.

This pragmatic posture was deeply appreciated, with the result that Blair has become the European leader who is most expert on the peace process. The two sides frequently consult with him on a personal basis, and meetings at 10 Downing have become a permanent station of Ehud Barak and Yasser Arafat on their way to and from Washington.

However, despite the uniform facade which is currently being shown by the British establishment, a variety of forces are at work behind the scenes. The Palestinians are investing considerable efforts to move British rhetoric in the direction desirable to them, and Labourites who are identified with the "old left," the Palestinians' traditional bastion of support, are constantly being interviewed and organizing public events. At this stage, though, they have not succeeded in enlisting the party's mainstream to support them.

Arab and Palestinian representatives are bringing extremely heavy pressure to bear on the British Foreign Office with the aim of obtaining a more critical line toward Israel. Their most galling failure occurred about 10 days ago when the Palestinians tried to drag Blair into issuing a one-sided condemnation of Israel when he was called upon to reply in the House to a question from a pro-Palestinian MP.

Blair did not deliver what the Palestinians wanted and expected: He cast the responsibility to restore order and calm equally on both sides, and called on both sides to return to the negotiating table. The Palestinians had not expected such an explicit indication of their responsibility for the continuation of the crisis.

Arafat fears attack on his person by settlers

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat has not visited the West Bank since early October, for fear that Jewish settlers might try to kill him, senior officials close to the Palestinian leader have said.

Arafat was last seen in the West Bank Oct. 3, a few days after the outbreak of the Al Aksa intifadah. He has travelled abroad dozens of times during the 10 weeks of fighting, but each time he has returned by helicopter or airplane to the Rafah airstrip in Gaza.

Arafat is convinced that Jewish extremists could harm him, perhaps by means of an attack with a lone M-16 rifle, the Palestinians say. In the event of such an assassination attempt, Arafat believes that Israel would not be able to, or might not have the inclination to protect him.

Security concerns, however, are not the only reason that Arafat has not set foot in the West Bank. Arafat is worried that Palestinian leaders in the area might submit a series of demands that he would be unable to meet, the sources say.

In addition, the PA chairman fears that under certain circumstances, Israel might keep him trapped in the West Bank, blocking his return to Gaza and effectively rendering him a prisoner in Ramallah.

Since the start of the violence, the West Bank and Gaza have basically functioned as two separate Palestinian states, an Israeli security source said. Though both areas come under Arafat's control, his hold on the West Bank is less stable. Fatah operatives have strengthened their positions in the West Bank, acting as independent players in the showdown with Israel.

Israeli security officials also believe that the PA security apparatus is unravelling and that the PA lacks sufficient funds to pay the salaries of its security personnel. Fatah activists are exerting heavy pressure on PA security officials, the Israeli sources say, trying to coax them into taking part in the armed struggle against Israel. In fact, there is something of a competition taking shape among individuals associated with different parts of the PA security system, with all trying to prove that they are most actively involved in anti-Israel actions.

Seek to uphold hate speech law

By ANNA COX
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — A Muslim radio station is asking the Johannesburg High Court to overturn a section of the broadcasters' code of conduct that prohibits hate speech.

Radio 786 brought the case after the South African Jewish Board of Deputies lodged a complaint against the station for airing a controversial program about the ideology of Zionism and how it resulted in the creation of the Jewish State.

"I accept that 1 million-plus Jews died during the Second World War, but I dispute the fact that they were murdered, that they were killed by gassing," Yacoub Zaki, a historian at the Muslim Institute in London, said during the broadcast.

"These people died, like other people in the camps, from infectious diseases, particularly typhus," he said.

Section 2(a) of the code states that broadcasters shall not air any material that is indecent or offensive to public morals, or is offensive to the religious convictions or feelings of any segment of the population.

The Board of Deputies contends that the section is a reasonable and justifiable limitation on the freedom of expression as provided for in the country's constitution, and that setting it aside would permit hate speech to be broadcast in South Africa.

"We maintain that Radio 786 has attempted to disguise classic anti-Semitic racism and Holocaust denial under the guise of opposition to the political ideology of Zionism," the Board said in a statement.

For its part, Radio 786 charged that the section was "put in place during apartheid days and is too broad. There are other clauses in the constitution which protect citizens from hate speech."

The court has not yet delivered a ruling.

Selective reporting of body counts

According to Reports

Comparing body counts is an ugly indulgence, but occasionally instructive. This is one of those occasions.

First the background: Following Israel's pinpoint helicopter strike on Palestinian Authority (PA) buildings in Gaza on Nov. 20 in retaliation for the roadside bombing of a school bus near Kfar Darom that left two Israelis dead and several children wounded – some severely, the U.S. State Department condemned Israel.

"Israel needs to understand that excessive use of force is not the right way to solve the problems," the U.S. State Department said.

One Palestinian was killed in the Israeli strike. The American Jewish community was extremely upset that the United States, Israel's closest ally, criticized Israel for defending its people.

Now the hypocrisy: On December 21, 1989, the United States sent 24,000 troops to Panama City, not because its soldiers and civilians were being fired upon or attacked in any way, but rather for the sole purpose of "arresting" (read: kidnapping) General Manuel Noriega.

Noriega was not accused of committing acts of violence or terrorism against the United States, but rather of drug trafficking, racketeering and money laundering.

The United States used stealth bombers in addition to helicopter gun ships. Over 10,000 Panamanians were made homeless and several hundred civilians were killed. (Unlike Israel, the United States gave no advance warning, either explicit or implicit, to alert civilians and save lives).

The U.S. Southern Command acknowledged that in a brief period, 314 Panamanian soldiers and 202 civilians died. No media were allowed to cover the operation; even the Red Cross was kept away. Stories filtered out of far higher death tolls. In Sept. 1990, CBS's 60 Minutes claimed thousands, in fact, may have been killed – all to capture one man for drug trafficking.

Did the U.S. State Department condemn this as an excessive use of force and poor way to solve problems?

Russian action on Iran could threaten Israel

By SHARON SAMBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Russia's decision to terminate its agreement with the United States on stopping Russian arms sales to Iran poses new threats to Israel's security, Jewish groups warn.

Last week, Moscow pulled out of a pact sealed in 1995 by then prime minister Viktor Chernomyrdin and Vice President Al Gore under which Russia agreed to end conventional arms exports to Iran.

A U.S. delegation travelled to Moscow last week, trying to preserve the embargo on weapons sales to Tehran.

"We remain committed to constraining arms sales that pose a threat to regional stability and to the national security interests of the United States, our friends, our allies in the region," State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said.

Boucher said the United States is not aware of any new Russian arms contracts with Iran, but wants the delegation to have a "frank and comprehensive discussion" with Russian officials about Moscow's future intentions.

Russian involvement in Iranian weapons programs remains a major concern, said Barry Jacobs, the American Jewish Committee's (AJC) director of strategic studies.

Jacobs voiced disappointment that the formal agreement was allowed to lapse, but said the Gore-Chernomyrdin deal was not very effective anyway.

"Russian assistance never stopped," Jacobs said, and therefore Iran remains a primary threat to Israel.

In its testimony at an Oct. 5 Senate hearing on the transfer of Russian technology and strategic weapons capabilities to Iran, the AJC called for U.S. restrictions on Iranian technology proliferation, and accused Iran of continuing to smuggle and develop weapons of mass destruction and delivery systems that could reach Israel.

The American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), the pro-Israel lobby, said Russian supply of weapons technology to rogue states like Iran remains an extremely serious problem.

Despite the passage this year of the Iran Nonproliferation Act, a measure designed to stop the flow of weapons technology from Russia to Iran, many have viewed the Clinton administration's approach to the problem as too soft.

The issue will remain a top priority for AIPAC regardless of who assumes the presidency in January, AIPAC spokesman Kenneth Bricker said.

"The next administration may take this matter more seriously," he added.

American Jewish groups had supported congressional attempts in 1998 to impose sanctions on Russian companies exporting missile technology to Iran. The Clinton administration, however, preferred to address the issue through diplomatic channels and stopped the legislation, saying it wanted more time to put a tough nuclear nonproliferation policy in place.

President Clinton did issue an executive order imposing economic penalties against Russian organizations that were found to be providing sensitive missile or nuclear assistance to Iran.

In 1998 Russia was involved in the construction of an Iranian nuclear facility, which Israel said might help Iran advance its military nuclear program and the production of nuclear byproducts. Earlier that year, the Kremlin announced that it had stopped supplying missile technology to Iran, and officials said they thwarted some Russian companies' plans to provide the Islamic republic with technology that could have military uses.

According to a Central Intelligence Agency report, Iran sought nuclear-related equipment, material, and technical expertise from Russia during the second half of 1999.

Mizrachi solidarity with Israel

JERUSALEM — A solidarity mission of 250 men, women and youth from the United States, Canada, France, Great Britain, South Africa, the former Soviet Union, Argentina, Brazil, Australia and Holland, representing World Mizrachi, Emunah, Amit, Bnei Akiva and Yavneh Olamit, passed the following resolution at their conference held on Nov. 25:

• We express our strong solidarity and loyalty to our movements in Israel and to our fellow Jews in all of Israel wherever they live.

• We urge our fellow Jews in our respective countries and all over the world to visit Israel at this difficult time to give encouragement and express our solidarity and comradeship to our beleaguered brethren.

• We urge the strengthening of Israel's hasbara to more effectively combat the hatred and falsehood being circulated by the Palestinian Authorities, together with Fatah and Hamas associates who have been orchestrating all the violence of the past two months. We call upon the Israeli government to make, as a precondition to any further discussion with the Palestinian Authority, the immediate arrest and detention of the terrorists who were released by the PA in the last two months.

• We must lend support. The morale of the country is suffering from the onslaught by the Palestinians, and the inadequate expression by political leadership of the righteousness of our cause – of Jewish ownership of this country and of our historic attachment to it.

• We reaffirm Jerusalem as our eternal and undivided capital as the focus of Jewish dreams throughout our long periods of exile.

• The battle for the existence of our beloved homeland underlines the need for better, more Jewish-focused education for our youth in Israel and in the world, and we regret that some politicians, journalists, academics and leaders of Israel, in word and in writing, undermine the confidence of the people of Israel.

• More than ever, the voice of Torah, of Jewish tradition and the effective education of our youth are the key to the future of Israel and of the Jewish people. We reaffirm our deep commitment to the eternal Mizrachi ideal of Eretz Yisrael, L'Am Yisrael al pi Torat Yisrael.

The week in Israel

Dec. 4

• Hezbollah officials refused a request by the Red Cross to visit with the three Israel soldiers and businessman who were kidnapped earlier in the year. According to an IDF inquiry, some of the gunmen who abducted the soldiers had been wearing UN peacekeeper uniforms.

Dec. 5

• The Bureau of Statistics reported that residents of Bnei Brak can expect to live the longest of all Israeli urban dwellers: women 81.1 years and men 77.4 years, compared to 79.6 years and 75.7 years respectively.

Dec. 6

• Israel's ambassador to Jordan, David Dadon, said there are no plans to evacuate the Israeli embassy there. Families of Israeli diplomats were sent home after Shlomo Ratzabi, an embassy employee, was shot and wounded in Amman, the second such attack in less than a month.

Dec. 7

• A Jerusalem court refused to dismiss the case filed against the PA by the family of Cpl. Vadim Nourzhich, one of the two soldiers lynched by a Palestinian mob in October in Ramallah.

• The IDF is equipping some of its soldiers with video cameras so they can document what happens during clashes with Palestinians. The move comes as part of the public relations battle the two sides are fighting, mirroring the violence on the ground.

Dec. 8

• Palestinian sources confirmed Mohammed Deif, the Hamas militant who tops Israel's most-wanted list, escaped the Gaza jail where he had been held for the past seven months. A Hamas Web site claimed Deif was assisted in his escape by the head of PA security in Gaza.

Israel: beware of 'internationalization'

By SIMON ROSENBLUM
Special to The CJN

When Yasser Arafat walked away from Camp David, he had an exit strategy in mind, a plan to end the Oslo peace process and begin a campaign to internationalize the conflict. Israel and its supporters have plenty of reasons to be concerned about such a development.

What exactly is meant by "internationalizing the conflict?" For starters, the Palestinians worked to create a perceived justification for international intervention. A new intifadah was the chosen instrument, with the crucial difference being that this one would be much more violent than its predecessor in the late 1980s. It is not surprising, therefore, that the common Palestinian refrain now is, "This is not an intifadah, this is war."

Israel, forced to respond, has been painted as the aggressor through a manipulation of media images.

It takes a lot of chutzpah to successfully pull off such a manoeuvre – sort of like the child who murders his parents and then begs the court for mercy on the grounds that he is a poor orphan. But, tragically, such a stunt can work. One only has to look at UN Security Council Resolution 1322 to see how the international community can be deceived into supporting a totally one-sided resolution condemning Israel for "disproportionality" and "excessive use of force."

Thankfully, such Palestinian "victories" are largely pyrrhic in nature. They do, however, further encourage violence – violence, one must add, that is totally forbidden by the Oslo accords.

But the Palestinians now see Oslo as a dead letter and are looking to go beyond the bilateral negotiations with Israel, mediated by the United States. And no wonder. After all, the Palestinian Authority (PA) was "only" offered 90 percent of its territorial demands by Israel at Camp David. So how could they do better? By internationalizing the conflict.

The current strategy of this game plan is the Palestinian proposal to the UN Security Council to deploy a 2000-strong armed international force to "protect" Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. Not making much headway with this proposal, their backup plan is for an unarmed force to be introduced into the territories, along the lines of the Norwegian-led international observers deployed in Hebron since 1994.

The French are now sponsoring such a proposal.

That the Palestinians only need protection from themselves and that they will be safe immediately upon ending their campaign of violence is, of course, from the Palestinian point of view, totally beside the point. Their intention is to saddle Israel with responsibility for their own violent actions.

"We need to have an international force to replace Israeli occupation troops," says Nabil Abu Rudeinah, an Arafat spokesperson.

Israel will only consider the deployment of a limited number of unarmed observers after an effective ceasefire, and only as part of a comprehensive peace settlement with the Palestinians. The United States, fortunately, has vowed to veto any such proposal that is not acceptable to Israel.

Most recently, the Palestinians have been talking about the need for an international peace conference with the participation of the UN, the European Union, China, Russia and the countries in the region – that is, a return to the kind of international sponsorship that was present in Madrid in 1991.

This intervention, the Palestinians hope, will gradually become an international source of authority for an alternative to the Oslo process as well as a source for international support for Palestinian demands.

The end goal is for the international community to force Israel to withdraw to the 1967 lines. PA Minister of Planning and International Co-operation, Nabil Sha'ath, has developed a plan based upon the "Namibia Model" to transfer the occupied territories to an international body that would, in turn, transfer them to the Palestinians. Israel and its friends must be on constant guard to prevent any such program from getting legitimacy.

No peace can be imposed upon Israel. The only peace worth having is one in which territorial adjustments are freely negotiated between the parties themselves and are backed up by the necessary security arrangements. Anything less (that is, the internationalization of the conflict) will only compromise Israel's essential security needs.

Engrossing games that children won't outgrow

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Coordinator

Tired of seeing your children spending too much time alone in front of the TV playing those expensive video games? The good news is there still are the engrossing board and activity games that families used to play.

The packaging is in sync with the new millennium and the games are updated. A recent example is a compact, easy-wipe portable kit of 50 games distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada ($29.99).

Now people from 6 to 99 can bridge the generation gap playing board games. Aptly named The Amazing Game Board Book, the kit is created in conjunction with Innovative Kids and Chronicle Books. Sherleen Gertel Rutman wrote the text, John Clementson drew the illustrations and Carrie Abel designed the kit.

Among the entertaining and educational offerings are Chinese Checkers, Pegboard Games, Magnetic Tangrams and Tri-za-ics, Razzle-Dazzle Puzzle, the Wizard of Where! (word search and other geography games), Wild words! (fill-in fiction and other word games), Brain Busters and other tricky teasers, Dueling Dominoes (and other matching games), Meandering Math Path (Add-Iplication Operation and other number games), Five-Minute Fun (and other quick games).

An educator's dream

The colourful cardboard kit is crafted in the shape of an 11 1/2 x 9 1/2 -inch loose leaf binder and thanks to an easy-to-manipulate self-seal flap everything is kept intact.

The package includes six game/activity boards, a chipboard puzzle, and write-on/wipe-off boards. A slide puzzle, punch-out vinyl magnetic checkers and game playing cards are bound in. The box contains peg-game pieces, colour dye, and write-on/wipe off markers.

Once the individual games are opened, you will notice lots of minuscule components. These can be safely stored in neat game drawers that are built into the kit. Check the surrounding area, to prevent toddlers and pets swallowing parts that fall astray.

The astute manufacturer provided a self-lock plastic bag but you will need a few more, when you start setting aside the kit's packaged components for each game. Simply tuck parts in the plastic bags and stuff them in the binder drawer. That way the game will last for years. Children lose patience when they're in the middle of an activity and a part is missing.

The packaging designers deserve credit for attaching each set of directions into a sturdy spiral-bound binder encased in the suitcase-style package. No matter how familiar you become with these games, you will count on the "written word" to settle player disputes. Game enthusiasts will appreciate the text that accompanies each game. The print-size is generous and the authors used boldface fonts and diagrams to highlight important points. The directions are concise and easy to comprehend.

Trivia buffs will enjoy the dialogue. Players are told the game of checkers was named after a chessboard. Invented 900 years ago in France, chess was played on a board called an eschequier – a chessboard. When a king piece in chess was about to be captured, the winning player would say "Eschec" (check). Now, when a playing piece reaches the other side of the board, we say "King me!"

Incidentally, this kit's checkerboard is magnetic and players are invited to punch out 24 checkers, 12 of each color from a vinyl magnetic sheet.

An educator's dream, these games make language arts, math and geography fun. The Fill-in Fiction Starship Trip incorporates parts of speech, for example, adjectives, verbs, and nouns. Players fill in the blanks to complete the fiction story. In Add-Iplication Operation, players compete in a fast-paced race that keeps them on their toes and counting. The game can be modified to suit the age of the player. For instance, a younger player can use addition, whereas an older sibling may prefer multiplication. Art enthusiasts are not forgotten. With a marker, a little imagination, and the washable drawing board as base, artists need only follow directions to draw sharks and monsters. Teamwork is encouraged in Designs for Doubles.

Once children reach six, they are old enough to play these games, albeit with an elder's guidance. They will gradually latch on to more of the 50 offerings as they mature.

Whether you buy the Amazing Game Board Book as a gift or you decide to purchase it to keep peace on vacation or at bubby's house, it's a good buy. These games will never go out of style and you will never have to replace batteries or click a computer mouse for them to kick-in. Besides, games serve as a good way to unite families. And isn't that what holiday time is all about?

Jazz, dance, a film score and spiritual music

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The Steve Koven Trio
Not By The Elbows
SKT

Steve Koven has been an emerging talent of the jazz club scene for many years now.

Music critics from his Toronto hometown and from as far away as England and Barbados have nothing but high praise for this piano player. Now the rest of us can hear why.

The Steve Koven Trio has recently released its third CD Not By The Elbows, recorded live at the Montreal Bistro in Toronto.

The nine-track CD mixes Koven's original tunes with very improvised renditions of classics like On The Sunny Side of the Street and Ellington's Caravan. The Trio's (Rob Clutton and Anthony Michelli on bass and drums respectively round up the group) version of The Eagles' Take It To The Limit is beyond recognition.

But the strength of this CD is the band's original songs. From the bluesy Bug's Blues to the dreamy ballad Une Nuit d'été, nothing quite prepares you for the innovative GAK which defies pigeon-holing.

It starts off slowly and eerily, like the score for a creepy horror movie. The chord progression then picks up tempo as the bass and cymbals kick in to a rousing crescendo before it calms down again, momentarily quiet enough to hear a pin drop. When you think the song is over, Koven turns it up a few notches again for the finale.

This highly innovative CD is released on the SKT label. It's available in major stores or you can e-mail sktrio@interlog.com

Zoom Golly
Let My People Go-Go
Roundlight Music

Where can you find Jewish classics like Chad Gadya and Shalom Chaverim served up with House Music and a touch of electronica?

Zoom Golly's debut CD Let My People Go-Go is just that and a lot more. If your teens and preteens don't know Hava Nagila from Hevenu Shalom Alechem, you might consider giving them this CD.

Hava Nagila is delivered here with a hard rock edge and spacey overdubs, while Hevenu Shalom Alechem is very rhythmic.

The opening track Zum Gali is dance-oriented – you can almost picture this on Much Music's Electric Circus.

California-based Zoom Golly also pens one song on this album, Bar Mitzvah. "I remember my bar mitzvah/ I was reading from the Torah/Afterwards I had a latkah/ When I was done I asked for morah."

The CD ends with Hatikvah sung over a dance track. All in all, this is a fun, enjoyable project. You might find yourself getting into the groove along with your kids.

Distributed by Roundlight Music [www.roundlight.com] and available on the Web at Amazon.com.

John Zorn
Film Works IX
Tzadik/Koch International

Saxophonist, composer John Zorn is probably best known for his Masada project, an exploration of Jewish cultural identity through a series of compositions that number over 200.

Masada released 10 studio and two live albums in a jazzy, klezmer style. Displaying his versatility, Zorn has also been in Naked City, a punk rock band.

Some of the Masada compositions as well as old classics like Simen Tov/ Mazel Tov and Sholom Aleichem have all been re-arranged by Zorn for piano and clarinet for Filmworks IX, the music score for the controversial documentary film Trembling Before God.

The CD features Jamie Saft on organ and Chris Speed on clarinet. It is a very soothing 60 minutes of haunting Jewish music. It is released in Canada by Koch International www.kochcan.com. 416-292-8111.

David Chevan and Warren Byrd
Let Us Break Bread Together
Reckless DC Music

It's a curious mix to say the least; but it seems to work.

Let Us Break Bread Together by David Chevan and Warren Byrd contains, as the subtitle says, "Further explorations of the Afro-Semitic experience."

Alternating between gospel and Jewish spiritual songs, Chevan (bass) and Byrd (piano) explore the bluesy roots underlying both genres and at the same time give the songs a pleasant jazz flavour.

The U.S.-based duo expands its interpretations and explorations of music from the Jewish and African-American sacred repertoire. Jewish songs include Eliyahu HaNavi, Nurit Hirsch's Oseh Shalom and two versions of Etz Chaim Hi. The CD is distributed by Reckless DC Music 203-287-5446. [www. chevan.addr.com]

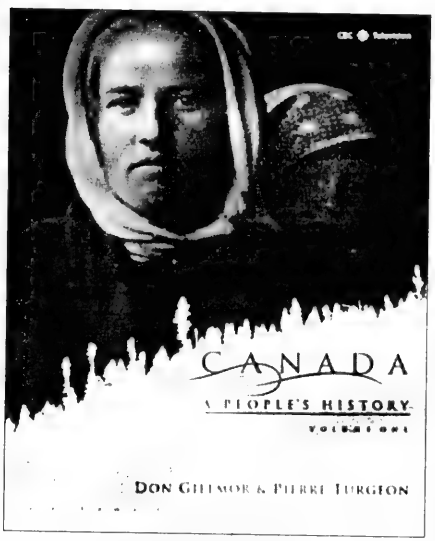
Books on Canadian history and literature show our culture is anything but dull



By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Canadian history isn't meant to be dull. The CBC's recent multi-part television series on that subject has drawn huge audiences by demonstrating that Canada's story is dynamic and colourful.

Published as a companion to the TV series, Canada, A People's History (Volume One) by Don Gillmore and Pierre Turgeon, pays further glorious tribute to our nation's past with a vibrant 300-page narrative adorned with hundreds of superb colour illustrations.

Canada, A People's History brings us from the mists of prehistory through to the resignation of our first prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1873. While it presents a full-blooded historical saga replete with great and clashing armies, it glorifies the stories of countless heroic men and women who helped make Canada great.

Beyond the fine writing, compelling art and enticing sidebars, the book's strength lies in its personal approach and its celebration of the role of the individual in the nation's saga. For anyone concerned with history, it makes a great gift. (McClelland and Stewart, $60.)

History of a decidedly more local and literary character is presented in Storied Streets: Montreal in the Literary Imagination, by Bryan Demchinsky and Elaine Kalman Naves. Readers may "let their fingers do the walking" through this large, 224-page celebration of a great city, as reflected in the prose of dozens of writers.

City descriptions are presented from the earliest explorers and missionaries to a cornucopia of recent and contemporary writers of diverse ethnic backgrounds, including Mordecai Richler, Leonard Cohen, Hugh MacLennan, Gabrielle Roy, Michel Tremblay and A.M. Klein. The book, which offers many archival photographs and illustrations, is a feast for the eye as well as the mind. (McFarlane Walter & Ross, $45).

Reissued last year as an updated softcover, Irving Abella's A Coat of Many Colours: Two Centuries of Jewish Life in Canada combines a lively, informative text with many archival illustrations, photographs and documents. The author's wide brushstrokes capture all the essential details in the multi-faceted tale of Canadian Jewry from pioneer days to the present. (Key Porter Books, $35.)

Anyone interested in Canadian literature and letters will appreciate Typing: A Life in 26 Keys, the intriguing memoir by celebrated Governor General's award-winner Matt Cohen, which he finished late last year only weeks before his untimely death.

The book, which chronicles Cohen's literary struggles against the chilly backdrop of the Canadian cultural landscape, was as compelling to me as any of his novels. What a surprise to find that this established icon of Canlit regarded himself, somewhat Kafkaesquely, as an outsider!

As such, he railed against the Canadian cultural establishment, including the literary critic Robert Fulford, now a National Post columnist. A couple of months back, Fulford fulminated that Cohen's memoir was mean-spirited. I saw little of that in my reading, only the fair and intelligent musings of a reliable observer and consummate writer. (Random House Canada, $32.95)

I close with another memoir and two novels by Canadian writers. Montrealer Irena F. Karafilly, who explored some Jewish themes in her recent travelogue Ashes and Miracles: A Polish Journey, has produced a memoir, The Stranger in the Plumed Hat. It recounts the painful story of her mother, who descended into the madness of Alzheimer's late in life. (Viking, $28)

Winnipeg historian Allan Levine published a handful of non-fiction works before branching out as a novelist. His second novel brings back the hard-boiled Jewish detective Sam Klein from his first novel. Sins of the Suffragette takes the wily sleuth back into Winnipeg's rough-and-tough North End in the WWI era, where he investigates the murder of a women's rights activist. (Great Plains, $19.95)

Last year's Jewish Book Awards honoured The Mark of the Angel, by Nancy Huston, as its fiction choice. The story involves a German woman who has an affair with a Hungarian instrument maker living in the Marais, Paris's Jewish quarter, in 1957, as the Algerian war rises to brutal intensity. (McArthur & Co., $24.95)

Two illustrated books on Jewish history

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Around the turn of the century, many in Toronto's growing Jewish community began moving a few blocks west of the slum known as the Ward.

The immigrants from Eastern Europe settled in the area known as Kensington, bounded by Spadina Avenue to Bathurst Street and College Street to Dundas Street.

Many felt comfortable there, and to this day, Kensington has been a home to waves of different immigrant communities and a hotbed of tolerance.

Kensington by Jean Cochrane (Boston Mills Press, $39.95) is a 160-page illustrated history book on one of the most popular shopping markets in Toronto.

This National Archives of Canada picture shows customers at Morris Zamonsky's kosher slaughter house at 18 Kensington Avenue c. 1922.

"If immigrants try to build a bit of home around themselves in the new country, the Jews of Kensington succeeded beyond most," Cochrane writes.

"Kensington became an almost self-sufficient village. The Yiddish for it is shtetl."

The Jews, and some of the other East Europeans who settled there, turned the neighbourhood into a vibrant market with its live poultry, fresh fish, "and the smell of bagels wafting over it all."

But at the time, Kensington was shunned by most of Toronto's Protestant citizens, and newspaper columns were rife with racist sentiments about the area.

But Kensington thrived – synagogues opened and left-wing political movements sprung up. Eventually the Jewish community outgrew the area and its affluence led it to greener pastures further north.

In the '50s, the Portuguese began to move in and later the Asians and Caribbeans. In the late '60s the area was threatened when the University of Toronto and Western Hospital both sought to expand into the area, but the residents pulled together and won.

In the '80s, Kensington Market was the setting for the popular television show King of Kensington.

Today Kensington is a mishmash of various ethnicities. The live chickens were bylawed into extinction and Shabbat morning is the busiest day of the week, but Kensington is still the place for fresh vegetables, fish, meat and cheap fashion.

With around 120 photos, some archival and many new by Vincenzo Pietropaulo, Kensington is the first full-length book on this neighbourhood. And though the Jewish community is mostly gone, its influence remains – two synagogues are still in use today – and Kensington plays a major part in the history of Canadian Jewry.

When Steven Spielberg set up the Shoah Visual History Foundation, his aim was to record the testimony of Holocaust survivors and thus to preserve the memory of the Shoah.

One of the products of the Foundation was the Academy Award-winning documentary The Last Days.

Last summer, a companion book The Last Days (McArthur & Company/ Harper Collins $29.95 trade) was released.

Like the documentary, The Last Days focuses on the testimony of six Hungarian survivors now living in the United States, one of whom is Tom Lantos, a U.S. congressman.

Because Hungary was an ally of Germany in World War II, the country's Jews were initially spared the full effect of the Holocaust.

The Hungarian puppet government did impose restrictions similar to those set up by Hitler in Germany prior to the outbreak of war, but it wasn't until the Germans were retreating from the advancing Soviets and occupied Hungary in March 1944 that Hungarian Jews began to be deported.

In fact, this might be the most brutal irony of the Shoah: that the retreating Germans, knowing they would eventually lose the war, hastened the execution of Jews in Europe.

Many historians have commented on how many valuable resources the Germans diverted from the war effort for the transportation and execution of Jews and other Holocaust victims.

The text of the book contains the testimony of the six survivors as delivered to the Shoah Foundation, plus the testimony of three U.S. soldiers who liberated Nazi concentration camps.

Spielberg offers a preface, and David Cesarani, professor of Jewish History, Culture, University of Southampton, writes a 30-page introduction that covers the history of the Holocaust as it happened in Hungary.

The archival black and white photos are interspersed with colour photos that chronicle the survivors' return to the camps with their families.

When the deportation of the Hungarian Jews began in earnest following the Nazi occupation, it was probably one of the most efficient and brutal roundups in all of the war.

Within 12 weeks, most Hungarians had been rounded up and deported to Poland.

It is amazing to see how these survivors, almost 60 years later, can recall with such vivid clarity the horror that surrounded them: what possessions they carried when they were rounded up; the cattle trucks, the lineups at the camps and the doctors directing them to the left or the right; the bunks and latrines; the gas chambers and the ovens.

One woman recounts how the moment she stepped off the train at Auschwitz, she and her sister were separated from their mother who was deemed unfit to work. "By the time my sister and I were processed into the camp, my mother was no longer alive."

When I reviewed the documentary last year I said The Last Days succeeds because it takes the Shoah out of the history books and turns it into a personal account filled with teary emotion and hope.

This book, although an excellent companion to the documentary, also stands on its own as a brilliant testimony to the Holocaust.

Chanukah Gifts

Chanukah gifts that children will cherish and parents will appreciate

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

On December 21, Jews around the world celebrate Chanukah, the Festival of Lights. They receive gifts and are on holiday from school. Therefore, it's an opportune time to present books that are enlightening and entertaining.

In 1997, Alison Fripp, a lawyer-turned publisher founded Lobster Press in Montreal (www.lobsterpress.com). The company's books are distributed in Canada through Raincoast Books (1-800-663-5714).

Abby and Tess Pet-Sitters series

Children, between seven and nine, will be captivated by The Abby and Tess Pet-Sitters series which is written and illustrated by Canadians Trina Wiebe and Marisol Sarrazin, respectively. Wiebe's series thus far includes Goldfish Don't Take Bubble Baths, Lizards Don't Wear Lip Gloss, Hamsters Don't Glow in the Dark, and Piglets Don't Watch Television.

In addition to reading the pocket-book size books ($6.95 each), children can visit Abby and Tess at www.abbyandtess.com. The Abby and Tess Pet-Sitters Club is headquartered in a (website) treehouse. Children are invited to write Dear Abby and Tess for pet advice, compose their own stories, draw pets, send animal postcards, and solve puzzles.

Like all good fiction writers, Wiebe supports her stories with strong plots, intriguing characters, and an element of conflict. Sisters Abby, 10, and Tess, 6, become pet-sitters to compensate for living in an apartment that frowns on pet-owning tenants.

While Abby is preoccupied with her goal of becoming a veterinarian, her kid sister, Tess, constantly intervenes creating chaos. Despite annoying her big sister, this little "dog impersonator" exhibits a certain amount of savvy. Therefore, they make a good team.

The author is an astute judge of children and the doubts they experience. Hence young readers will identify with the characters and their concerns. Tolerance, self-esteem, and sharing are conveyed through the charming tales. Sarrazin, a Quebec illustrator, does justice to drawings that accompany the text.

The author has enhanced her books with information on each of the pets the children encounter. For example, in Goldfish Don't Take Bubble Baths, readers learn goldfish like cold water. They could live 20 years or more. Although referred to as goldfish, they are not always gold. Fish should be fed daily. They eat in a few minutes and should not be overfed. Some of the water must be replaced every few days to get rid of ammonia.

That Curly-Haired Girl

Author Elise Feltren and illustrator Andries Cheung teamed up for Feltren's first children's book That Curly-Haired Girl ($10.95) Lobster Press distributed by Raincoast Books. These talented Canadians present a delightful portrait of Andrea, an elementary grade school girl. Endowed with long, curly locks, Andrea grew tired of people reciting the old refrain: "There was a little girl, who had a little curl, right in the middle of her forehead. When she was good, she was very, very good but when she was bad she was horrid."

Children in the four to seven-age group will appreciate Andrea's solution. Colourful illustrations and a witty storyline prove entertaining. If you want to share a chuckle with your little ones, try reading it aloud before you tuck them in. Furthermore, they won't have nightmares from this one or any of the others reviewed here.

How Cold Was It?

Last winter's bestseller How Cold Was It? ($9.95) is now available in glossy softcover from Lobster Press distributed by Raincoast Books. Author Jane Barclay, won the 1998 Writer's Union of Canada Writing for Children Competition for this literary contribution.

Children, especially those ages four to nine, love rhyming sequences. Illustrator Janice Donato's drawings of the protagonist shivering accompanied by Barclay's text form a winning combination. Canadian youngsters will relate to the author's vivid description of chilly winter weather.

A rapt audience will scan Donato's artwork while they focus on catchy phrases such as "car-wheezing, engine-seizing, snow-shoveling, ice-scraping, temperature-falling, taxi-calling kind of cold." The story is told in first person.

Jason Mason Middleton-Tapp

Unlike the grade school protagonist that remained personable, albeit unnamed, in How Cold Was It?, the hero of the next children's storybook has a long name.

Moreover, the title of the book bears his name. Jason Mason Middleton-Tapp detests naps, so when the four-year-old is sent upstairs to bed, he whips out a crayon and draws a picture on the floor. The imaginative youngster transforms his bedroom into a fantasy playground.

Like all the books reviewed here, this one also boasts colourful illustrations. Quebecer Isabelle Charbonneau's whimsical drawings match the inspiring story by Ontario author John Roy Bennett. Distributed by Raincoast Books for Lobster Press, this softcover books sells for $10.95.

Parents can read this one aloud to children in the two to Reissued Leonard Cohen novel worthy of consideration

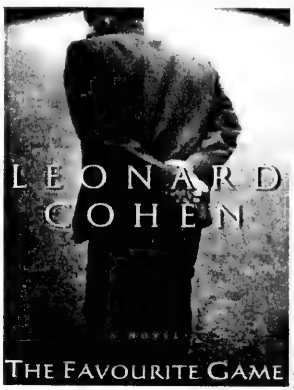
By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

It seems so long ago that Leonard Cohen, a fresh-faced Jewish golden-boy poet from Montreal, produced his first novel, The Favourite Game, which he alternately regarded as a masterpiece and an artistic disaster. It was 1963, the year the Beatles debuted and Kennedy was assassinated.

Cohen had already established himself as an important poet with Let Us Compare Mythologies (1956) and The Spice-Box of Earth (1961). Still, his Canadian publisher, McClelland & Stewart, rejected an early draft of the book, only one of two novels that Cohen would produce. (Beautiful Losers appeared in 1966.)

Cohen reacted by cutting the manuscript in half, explaining that "anyone with an ear will know I've torn apart orchestras to arrive at my straight, melodic line." The revised draft was published in England in 1963 and New York in 1964, but not in Canada until M&S attained reprint rights in 1970.

As if to atone, M&S recently produced an attractive "trade paperback" (softcover) edition of The Favourite Game ($16.99). The edition will likely attract new readers and induce previous readers to revisit the book, some (such as myself) for the first time since university days.



For me, the biggest surprise upon rereading The Favourite Game is its level of satire, much of it directed at the Jewish community. From a few passages, one might reasonably conclude that Cohen and Mordecai Richler were twins, separated at birth.

For example, the early scene in which protagonist Lawrence Breavman and his friend Krantz, as teenagers, try to meet some French girls at a Montreal dance hall where speaking English and being Jewish, they are vastly outnumbered. Evidently feeling protective of their women, some guys confront them.

"Where you live, you?"

"Westmount," they reply; Cohen comically defines the suburb as "a collection of large stone houses and lush trees arranged on the top of the mountain especially to humiliate the underprivileged."

"You have not the girls in Westmount, you?"

A fight erupts and the scene dissolves into comic pandemonium. It concludes when Breavman provides a Judaic interpretation of the action: "We were mocked, Krantz. We seized the pillars and brought down the temple of the Philistines."

Cohen is an overridingly lyrical and intensely poetic writer, whereas Richler, at his best, provides mature dramatic scenes and full characterizations along with his satire. There is justification for observing that Cohen's vision is so overridingly poetic as to exclude many novelistic expectations and concerns.

The Favourite Game gets as close to autobiography as Cohen has ventured; he and Breavman have many shared characteristics, including a father who dies early and a mother who becomes psychotic. "Lawrence Breavman isn't me, but we did a lot of the same things," Cohen once explained.

Critics have pegged The Favourite Game as a bildungsroman novel that depicts the artist at various stages in his emotional and artistic development. Comparisons have been made to James Joyce's Portrait of The Artist As A Young Man and, somewhat more questionably, to Charles Dickens' David Copperfield.

A comparison I find more apt is Canadian novelist Paul Quarrington's observation that Breavman, in his native purity and his stance against phoniness, resembles Holden Caulfield from J.D. Salinger's famous novel, Catcher In The Rye. Quarrington notes an even more fitting resemblance to another celebrated Salinger character, Seymour Glass: "Both characters are precocious children who become accomplished poets and search for spiritual enlightenment."

On one level, The Favourite Game is a young man's voyage of discovery of women and the physical body, yet it's also intensely spiritual in outlook. In this sense it resembles King Solomon's Song of Songs.

"It's Jewish to the core, so steeped in biblical consciousness that Cohen has no need to draw direct analogies between his brave and bereaved protagonist and the psalmists," notes critic T. Rigelhof. "Breavman is simultaneously a priest exiled in Babylon mourning the loss of King Solomon's glories and King David reveling carnally in the delights of a multitude of women ...."

While The Favourite Game is certainly no artistic disaster as Cohen once feared, it also falls short of being a masterpiece. Nearly four decades after its initial publication, it stands out as phenomenal, delightful and breathtaking, but also as narrow and silly. Ultimately, it's as distinctive as the "famous blue raincoat" of a famous poet, and deserves consideration for that reason alone.

Bellow's biography hard to resist

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Born to Russian-Jewish parents in the Montreal suburb of Lachine in 1915, Chicago author Saul Bellow has written many bestselling novels and won the Nobel, Pulitzer and many other literary prizes. His books include Herzog and Humboldt's Gift and Henderson the Rain King; the most recent is last year's well-received Ravelstein.

He is part of a venerated old guard of American Jewish writers concerned with the immigration-assimilation experience, whose ranks also include Henry Roth, Bernard Malamud and Philip Roth.

Apparently none of the 84-year-old's creative powers have failed him; last year, he and his 40-year-old fifth wife, Janis Freedman, formerly of Toronto, had a child.

Bellow, James Atlas's full-fledged literary biography of this dynamic subject, is the kind of book that anyone with a predilection towards Jewish and indeed American fiction will find hard to resist. Although you may intend to read it in a linear fashion, you may end up as I did, flipping pages and gobbling up choice anecdotes and other morsels where they lie: a sure sign of compelling readability. (Random House, $53)

This season's literary crop includes these two first novels on Jewish themes, penned by American female authors; even their titles – The Family Orchard and Bee Season — somehow suggest they be considered together.

In The Family Orchard, Nomi Eve spins a six-generational Jewish family saga that stretches from Eastern Europe to Israel, then America. The themes and motifs seem drawn from the vast garden of Jewish literature, the imagery derived from the Bible, shtetl and Jewish legend. As befits literature in the internet age, the text is embellished with non-linear journal entries, historic illustrations and genealogical charts. (Knopf, $36.95)

The bees in Myla Goldberg's Bee Season are not the kind that sting — at least not at first. The story concerns a nine-year-old student's surprising victories in a local and then a national spelling bee, and the effects of these wins upon her Jewish family. But in this coming-of-age novel, certain family secrets get spilled like a handful of Scrabble pieces — and they spell big trouble. (Random House, $32.95)

Another first novel, The Interpreter by Suzanne Glass, poses a compelling moral dilemma. Dominique, a simultaneous interpreter whose best friend is HIV positive, overhears through her headset some doctors discussing how they are suppressing a breakthrough cure for AIDS.

Although outraged, she feels she cannot do anything because of her professional vow of confidentiality. She is soon involved in a romantic relationship; the dilemma tests the character of her lover and her love for him. (McArthur & Co., trade paperback, $21.95)

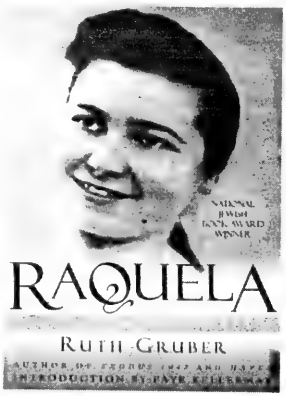
Winston Churchill considered the controversial WWII Commander Orde Wingate to be a military genius; others regarded him as mad. Born a fundamentalist Christian, Wingate became a religious mystic and was passionate about music, literature, philosophy, history, politics — and Zionism.



Posted to Palestine in 1936, he headed an irregular air squad that decimated Arab rebel bands and helped train a future generation of Israeli generals. His extraordinary biography is recounted in Fire in the Night: Wingate of Burma, Ethiopia and Zion, by John Bierman and Colin Smith. (Random House, $44.95)

Another worthy historical biography is Raquela: A Woman of Israel, by Ruth Gruber, the ex-news correspondent who wrote Exodus 1947.

A ninth-generation Jerusalemite, Raquela Prywes was a hospital and battlefield nurse in the Holocaust and War of Independence eras; she later helped save lives in the Six Day War. This award-winning book was first published in 1978. (Three Rivers Press, softcover, $24)

Israel influences award-winning artist's work

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO—Vibrant, bright colours contrasted with subdued dessert tones are the hallmark of the paintings by award winning artist, Bilha Morgan.

Morgan's watercolours and acrylic paintings are on exhibit at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, in the Rachel Restaurant, 4588 Bathurst St., to Feb. 7. It is sponsored by The Israeli Artists Group of Toronto.

"For the first 25 years of my life," says Morgan, "I lived in sunny Israel. This has greatly influenced my painting style, leading me to the use of luminous, intense colours and dramatic contrasts of lights and darks."

Morgan, 54, who also sculpts, was born in Poland. Her family moved to Israel in 1949. After serving in the army, she went to study in England and worked there for the Israeli Government Tourist Office.

While in England, she met and married Paul Morgan. They returned to Jerusalem where they lived until 1976 when they came to Canada to join Paul's family.

She said she always excelled in art but she did not have the time to study formally until 1979 when she enrolled at George Brown College. She continued her art studies at Central Technical School where she received a fine arts diploma and went on to study at the University of Toronto.

Morgan said that her works are created in a number of stages.

"Once a subject inspires me, I invest much time studying and observing it. Then comes the drawing stage—this takes control and experimentation.

"At this stage, spontaneity and excitement take over—letting go—I let the watercolours and acrylics mix with water on the paper, move with gravity, and interact with as little brush manipulation, or control as possible."

Bilha Morgan's art is created in a number of stages.

She adds that the final stage again requires control. She pushes an area into the background or pulls it forward by darkening or lightening it, and by greying or brightening it.

"By integrating a sense of spirituality, I hope to evoke an emotional response from the viewer. I have been elevated to a higher spiritual level. Hopefully, through my work, the viewer is also taken on a wondrous visual journey."

Her paintings span from a watercolour titled the Galil, Florals, Northern Lights, the Sun Worshipper and many other creative themes.

Morgan teaches art privately and adult classes for the Toronto Board of Education. She is a member of the Toronto Watercolour Society, North York Visual Artists, the Willowdale Group of Artists and the Israeli Group of Artists.

Vintage CBC radio plays now on cassette

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Before television transfixed the country in the 1950s, Canadians invariably tuned in to radio for their nightly entertainment.

Back in those days, radio dramas produced by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were very much in vogue, and some of the most popular programs bore the imprint of Stage 55.

In 1954, just as radio was being overtaken by television, CBC broadcast two plays that attracted the attention of Jewish listeners – Lies My Father Told Me by Ted Allan and Never Had It So Good by Charles Israel, both of which were directed by Andrew Allan.

A drama with comedic overtones, Lies My Father Told Me turns on a Montreal Jewish family in the 1920s torn by inter-generational conflicts.

By contrast, Never Had It So Good, set soon after World War II in occupied Germany, is about a Holocaust survivor who falls in love with the daughter of a senior American army officer.

Interaction makes whodunit enjoyable for actress

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Just as a live broadcast of a radio drama goes to air, a dead body is discovered. A detective is called in to investigate. The zany characters from the radio station intermingle with the guests sitting in the audience, and the audience then finds itself participating in solving the crime.

This is the premise behind Murder On The Air! (A 1940's Radio Mystery), the latest whodunit now playing at Mysteriously Yours..., 2026 Yonge St.

Actress Tracey Erin Smith was attracted to the play because of its interaction with the audience.

"There is so much interaction with the audience when I'm playing Rosebud. I get to flirt with the men, tell women how beautiful they look, touch people's shoulders, pinch their cheeks and look into their eyes. In terms of my acting career, it is the most intimate and positive contact I've ever had with an audience," Smith, 30, says.

Tracey Erin Smith

Smith dons a platinum blonde wig to play Rosebud, a character in the spirit of Judy Holliday or a Jewish Marilyn Monroe.

"Rosebud is very sexy, innocent and full of love," says Smith. "She's a budding actress who used to be a brilliant physicist. I gave her a PhD in physics and journalism from Harvard."

Smith's first acting job was at the age of six months when she appeared on a television commercial selling diapers. Encouraged by her mother, actress and singer Jodi Pape, Smith appeared onstage for the first time at six years old in a professional production of Anna Furstenberg's Razzamatazz and the Ass' Dragon at Theatre Plant in Toronto.

Smith attended the Claude Watson School for the Performing Arts and then moved to Montreal for three years to study English and theatre. In 1992, seeking an intense acting program, she moved to Vancouver to attend a three-year program at Studio 58.

"After I graduated from Studio 58, I worked as a professional actress in British Columbia for the next three years. I toured the province's schools twice with two different shows, Theatre Axis' Trolldom, As If By Magic, about Scandinavian mythology, which I helped to write, and Carousel Theatre's Goodbye Marianne.

"I also acted in Plague of the Gorgeous for Out West Theatre and created and performed in Two Hander, a one-woman show set in the '40s about a woman who severs her hand," says Smith.

The actress also hosted her own national television show called Jobs 1,2,3. Her other television credits include a principal role in Millennium for American television.

Smith has garnered a number of awards, including the Anthony Holland Scholarship, Studio 58, the British Columbia Ministry of Cultural Arts Board Senior Award Scholarship and the Beta Sigma Phi Scholarship for Outstanding Ability in Performing Arts.

In 1998, Smith came back to Toronto and took a break from acting. She gave motivational talks to high schools around the city and ran Canada's only resource centre for people working in the arts. She was invited to serve on the Prime Ministers' Task Force for Youth Entrepreneurship.

In addition, she began teaching acting at the Learning Annex and at Second City, where she herself had taken classes. Murder On The Air! marks Smith's first professional production since arriving back home.

Smith loves the stage, but says, "I'm most passionate about teaching performing. It might sound silly, but my greatest thrill is to help people see how fabulous they are," Smith says.

In her spare time, Smith enjoys singing, dancing, lots of reading and designing acting workshops.

To catch Smith as Rosebud in Murder On The Air! (A 1940's Radio Mystery), playing until the end of February at Mysteriously Yours..., call 416-486-7469 or 1-800-668-3323.

PLAYWRITING CONTEST SEEKS SUBMISSIONS

The theatre is a difficult business and the profession of playwright a lonely and often unrewarding one. Thus, it's great to see that the Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto is again sponsoring its annual Jewish playwriting contest, a tradition now entering its second decade.

What's worth more than rubies to an aspiring Neil Simon or William Shakespeare? The answer is recognition (but rubies would also be nice). The prize, therefore, is a staged directed reading in the new Bloor JCC Theatre.

The play must have Jewish content, should have not been produced commercially, and the author should be Canadian or have a strong Canadian connection. The deadline for submission is March 1, 2001.

The contest marks the Bloor Jewish Community Centre's 50th anniversary. For details, contact the Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave., Toronto M5S 2J2. 416-924-6211 or bloorjcc@echo-on.net

Lenny Solomon in Concert: Jazz violinist Lenny Solomon has led a varied musical career ever since he and a school friend, Myles Cohen, formed the folk-rock duo Myles and Lenny in the '70s, signed a contract with Columbia Records, and subsequently won a Juno award.

Later he formed the Lenny Solomon Band, then the classical ensemble Quintessence. He has performed and recorded with a score of celebrities from Liza Minelli to Anne Murray, Raffi to Prairie Oyster. He is currently a member of the Galaxy Trio and leader of a new group, World On A String.

Solomon performs with pianist Bernie Senensky at the Koffler Centre School of Music's annual Raye Horowitz Memorial Concert, Leah Posluns Theatre, Sunday Dec. 17, 2 p.m. Adults $15, seniors and students $10. 636-1880, ext. 228.

Jewish Life in Alberta: The Jewish Archives and Historical Society of Edmonton and Northern Alberta (JAHSENA) recently published a comprehensive record of Jewish life in that region of Canada.

At 316 pages, the well-illustrated hardcover book is titled The First Century of Jewish Life in Edmonton and Northern Alberta, 1893-1993: the First and Second Generations. It was compiled by Uri Rosenzweig. Although it does not offer a definitive history, it presents a nostalgic and informative "postcard" view of people and places.

The book is available only through JAHSENA. The cost is $50 plus $5 for mail orders. 7200 156 St., Edmonton AB T5R 1X3. 780-489-2809.

Prison Correspondence: The Cranbrooke Friendship Club presents Letters from Robben Island, a selection of Ahmed Kathrada's published prison correspondence from 1964 to 1989. Kathrada was a political prisoner arrested with Nelson Mandela and other leaders of the anti-apartheid movement in South Africa. He was imprisoned for 25 years.

Talk and discussion by Prof. Ben Shek, to whom Kathrada wrote a letter in 1988. Monday Dec. 19, 12:30 p.m. Lunch & program, $6. Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave.

• Students of Earl Haig Secondary School present the clever Stephen Sondheim musical Anyone Can Whistle, Dec. 13 to 16. $12. 100 Princess Ave. 416-395-3841.

• If Not Now... When? is a play about seniors facing the future; it is being presented in six communities around Ontario, followed by discussion. For details, contact the Ontario Society (Coalition) of Senior Citizens' Organizations. 416-785-8570.

• Yids in the Hall, the annual Dec. 25 all-Jewish comedy showcase, is hosted by wise-guy Lou Eisen at Yuk Yuk's Superclub, Eglinton & Yonge streets., 8:30 p.m.

• Published by Readers Digest, The Top 10 of Everything 2001 is a softcover compilation of more than 1,000 top-10 lists on science, society, sports, music, movies, commerce and other areas. At $29.95, it makes an interesting gift for trivia nuts.

CBC plays remastered

These vintage radio plays, having been remastered, have now been brought out in a two-cassette package by Scenario Productions of Toronto.

Immensely endearing, Lies My Father Told Me revolves around a contentious triangular relationship. Joe, a Canadian-born accountant with progressive views, resents his son David's attachment to his cantankerous grandfather, Tanenbaum, a religious Jew and a rag peddler.

Such is Tanenbaum's influence over David that Joe deeply resents the old man and wants him and his wife to leave their home.

Joe believes that Tanenbaum is filling David's head with superstitious nonsense and undermining his bond with him. "Look what's happened to our boy!" Joe shouts. "You're destroying him, making an idiot out of him."

Tanenbaum, in turn, has contempt for Joe, a secular Jew, claiming that his "open mind" is like a sieve and holds nothing. In the same breath, Tanenbaum urges David to honour and respect his father, but it is an unconvincing admonition.

Lies My Father Told Me is as enjoyable as it must have been 46 years ago. It stars, among others, Paul Kligman, Lloyd Bochner and William Shatner, all of whom went on to bigger and better things.

Never Had It So Good, which pits a U.S. colonel against the collective will of a group of Jews bent on settling in Palestine despite a British blockade, crackles with the tension of a forbidden interfaith romance.

Watson, the colonel, has decided to expropriate a co-operative farm run by East European Jewish refugees. He sends Adams, a subordinate, to inform them of his decision. Peter, their young leader, accepts the bad news grudgingly.

Shortly afterwards, Watson's fetching young daughter, Dorothy, arrives on the scene. Unlike her father, who constantly refers to the refugees as "monkeys" and "black marketeers," she is clearly sympathetic to the plight of the Jews.

Dorothy is ardently wooed by Adams, the colonel's second-in-command, but she is fixated on Peter. Dorothy's infatuation grows after Peter exposes her to the misery of a displaced persons' camp.

When the colonel discovers that she intends to elope to Palestine with Peter, he explodes, dismissing him as "a foreigner and a Jew."

The audience is left wondering whether Dorothy will go through with her audacious plan.

Starring Howard Milson, Lloyd Bochner, James Doohan and Toby Robbins, Never Had It So Good is sometimes a tad too melodramatic. But on balance, it's a play with a strong and absorbing plot.

SHOWING SUPPORT FOR ISRAEL: NEW SOLIDARITY MISSION PLANNED FOR EARLY 2001

Bombarded with close-up television images of unrest and turmoil, some Canadians have postponed their planned trips to Israel.

The Israel Government Tourist Office reports that the flow of travelers from Canada to Israel has fallen by more than 40 per cent in the last two months. The IGTO has had to drastically lower its previously rosy forecasts for what had started out as a record-breaking year for Canadians visiting Israel.

The forecast had been set at 65,000. Now at best the figure may match the 51,500 who came to Israel in 1999.

Faced with a corresponding decrease in passenger numbers, El Al is flying smaller planes and combining routes in order to keep operations in the black. It has also temporarily dropped its rates from about $1,300 to $999.

According to Stanley Morais, sales and marketing manager for El Al Canada, this was looking to be one of the best years yet for El Al's operations in Canada, until the Palestinians renewed their intifada. "We've had around 40 percent in cancellations," he said. "For many, these are only postponements. People are talking about going in February or March. But who knows how long the situation will continue?"

In Israel, the tourism industry is hurting badly as the violence stretches into a third telegenic month. While most of the demonstrations, rock-throwings and shootings are limited to certain localities in the West Bank and Gaza, hotels and restaurants everywhere in Israel have gone into a slump. The industry has lost an estimated $1-billion in projected revenues.

Many hotels have shut down floors and laid off staff. According to rumour, Jerusalem's famed King David Hotel housed only seven guests during one tense period recently. Tour guides are taking upgrading courses coordinated through the Ministry of Tourism.

Early last month about 1,500 Diaspora Jews participated in a Solidarity Mission to Israel. Rabbi Moshe Shulman, spiritual leader of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, was one of about 120 people from Canada who dropped everything on short notice to go.

Israelis hung banners from the walls of the Old City to express thanks to mission participants for coming. Rabbi Shulman said, and even taxi drivers were uncharacteristically gracious in showing appreciation to the visitors. "Everywhere we went, the Israelis were talking about the planeloads of people who had come to Israel just to be there. The message of solidarity was so strong and so uplifting that it made a huge difference for people."

The country also recently welcomed a group of 5,000 Christians who likewise refused to be intimidated by the disturbances. Tourism officials report that many Christians are standing fast by Israel, continuing to visit despite the crisis.

Arie Shevy-Shibi, director of the IGTO in Toronto, declares that most Israelis have been unaffected by the violence in their everyday lives, and that even visitors can get around without undue difficulties or concern, provided they exercise caution.

"Most of the places where the clashes occur — Nablus, Ramallah, Bethlehem, Gaza, Gilo — are not tourist hot spots," he said. "In Jerusalem you can go through the markets from the Jaffa Gate to the Muslim Quarter, and to the Western Wall. Except for the mosques you can go anywhere in the Old City. People don't know this."

Numerous organizations, including the Canada-Israel Committee, the Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, jointly coordinated the recent mission. Jesse Guberman of B'nai Brith Canada said that a second Canadian mission to Israel is being planned for early in 2001. For details, phone him at 416-633-6224, ext. 140.

"The best way to show solidarity with Israel is on the ground," Guberman said.

Chances are, Rabbi Shulman will join the next mission. "If we stop going to Israel, they've won," is his simple but powerful message. By following the news reports and the advice of Israelis, visitors can avoid unsafe areas, he said. "It's still statistically more dangerous to get into a car and drive on the 401, but we do it because we need to.

"In the same way, a Jew can't live without Israel. For us, Israel is a lifeline and if we stop going to Israel because some maniacs decide they're going to start shooting on some roads in some parts of the country, then we've lost before we've begun to fight. Israel is part of our heart and soul. It's who we are."

Tournament held in memory of coach Karry

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The first Sunday in December proved an emotional and bittersweet day for the alumni of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto.

After four months of hard work, their efforts culminated in a three on three basketball tournament in honour of Shawn Karry, a former teacher and coach at Associated.

Karry was killed in a biking accident approximately a year and a half ago.

Karry's tenure as coach at Associated left a positive impact on his former students and at the end of the last school year, Grade 12 students Oren Cainer and Daniel Rattner decided to organize an event that would memorialize Shawn's life and what he stood for, while raising money for a worthy cause.

'He left a positive impact on students'

"We chose the Toronto Star Fresh Air Fund because it helps underprivileged kids experience summer camp. He was interested in kids and sports," Cainer said.

At the end of the last school year, both Cainer and Rattner were determined the tournament would become a reality. Teachers and other students volunteered their help, and the hard work of planning began in the fall.

"Once school started, we began to call companies to get some sponsorship," Cainer said. "Once we had the date and the gym booked, there was no turning back for us. A lot of the people [students] were willing to help out. The teachers helped with administration.

"Some companies were eager to help," Cainer said. "No Frills donated 200 bottles of water for us. Roots donated [some items]. The Toronto Maple Leafs sent stickers and [Leafs forward] Steve Thomas autographed merchandise."

The items were raffled off in the CHAT gymnasium during breaks between games. First prize was a pair of platinum tickets for a Raptors game.

In September, the students contacted Karry's mother, who gave the tournament her blessings.

"I explained when they called me that I was delighted with the prospect. I told them that I thought it was a wonderful thing to do," said Karry's mother, Gail Hazell.

A total of 17 boys and six girls teams took part in the round robin tournament, with each team guaranteed at least two games 15 minutes long.

Even though the main objective was to remember Karry and to support charity, some teams were very competitive on the court. Others less so.

"Some people didn't play seriously out there because it's for charity," Rattner said. "They just wanted to have a good time. Those who didn't know him that well were more competitive."

Rattner said he and Cainer want to make the tournament an annual event for years to come.

"We're hoping to create a folder with information on the [sponsors]. Hopefully it will get bigger over the years. We will pass on the responsibility to the Grade 11s for next year," he said.

When the day was over, the money raised for the Fresh Air fund exceeded expectations.

"At the beginning we thought that we would raise $1,500. About $2,000 or more was raised," Rattner said.

"Everything went really smoothly. It was organized well and a teacher gave up his day to supervise," Rattner said.

Hazell watched all four hours of basketball, as well as the various raffles.

"[Shawn] would have been delighted at the outcome, because children will benefit from it," said Hazell. "He would have been proud to see that the idea was followed through to fruition and that the children handled it on their own."

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

A conversation on Har Herzl

There are times when even the most innocently intended comment can strike a sensitive chord in us and highlight the fault lines that exist between individuals and cultures.

Dina Wachtel is a shlicha with the Vancouver Jewish community. During a visit with a local family, Dina's host noticed Dina's five-year-old son playing a game outside her house. Observing the child's obvious athleticism, the host commented that "he looks like he will be a good soldier..."

The comment, although not meant to be offensive in any way, felt like a blow. On reflection, Dina realized that the remark reflected a commonly held attitude of Diaspora Jews that Israeli parents are eager to see their children grow up and serve in the Israel Defence Forces.

In actual fact, the opposite is true. While most Israeli parents want their children to proudly serve their country and enlist in the IDF, they have an even deeper wish that Israel will have no need for an army when their children graduate from high school.

This brings to mind a story written by a friend of mine, Alison Epstein, concerning an experience we both shared in Israel this past Yom Hazikaron on Har Herzl, Israel's national military cemetery.

Our group of four from Toronto was looking for the grave of Hannah Senesh, the poet and paratrooper executed by the Nazis after she parachuted into eastern Europe to join resistance efforts.

We were concluding the Israel portion of the 2000 March of the Living and had come to Har Herzl to pay our respects with other mourners on this Yom Hazikaron, remembrance day for fallen Israeli soldiers.

Eli Rubenstein, one of our group, asked a woman walking near Rabin's grave if she knew where Senesh's marker was located.

"No," she replied. "But I know where my brother is buried."

"Oh, where did he fall," Eli asked in Hebrew.

"He didn't fall; he was murdered," she said.

Eli apologized for his Hebrew, thinking he had used the wrong word to describe her brother's death.

"No," she said, "you used the right word, [for those who die in battle]. But my brother was murdered."

She related how her brother's platoon had been captured by Egyptians during the Yom Kippur War. The entire platoon had been beaten and tortured. All but her brother had survived; his body came home in a coffin.

Indeed, we often look for the well-known heroes and heroines in military cemeteries. But Israel has almost 20,000 Hannah Seneshes.

Israel was built on the sacrifices of many, many young men and woman, who will forever remain unknown to us, but for the chance encounters like the one mentioned above. Sadly, their sacrifices continue every day as the crisis in the Middle East persists with alarming predictability. We pray for the day when such sacrifices – as heroic as they are – will no longer be necessary.

We also yearn for a time when Israeli parents can raise their children without having to fear that they too will, one day, be forced to bear arms to defend Israel's border, a time when young Israelis graduating from high school will be thinking about which university they wish to attend or which vocation to choose, rather than in which army unit to serve.

1 tblsp sugar or to taste	1/4 cup oil

Peel and finely grate potatoes. Drain. In a bowl, mix potatoes with eggs and flour. Add sugar, salt and raisins. Make patties. Mixture will be loose.

Spray large frying pan. Add oil and fry patties until lightly browned on both sides.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have never been someone who needed to have something to do on New Year's Eve. I have no problem ordering a pizza and watching the ball in Times Square drop. I usually drop off to sleep long before the ball does anyway. I am 38, single, a woman and generally comfortable in my ways.

A few weeks ago, I was introduced to a nice gentleman. We have gone on a few dates. He wants to attend a large bash in a hotel where his friends and their wives will be. It's formal, $150 per person, and he asked me if I would pay for myself since it is such an expensive event. We have been splitting bills since we met, which I don't mind doing since I feel no obligations to him.

Anyway, I don't want to go to this thing on New Year's. I don't feel comfortable in such a formal setting and I really don't feel like spending $150 either. How do I get out of this gently.

No Interest in New Years

Dear No Interest,

Many people don't regard New Year's Eve as an important event and then there are others who find it one of the loneliest nights of the year.

You sound like an independent woman, secure enough not to make a big deal about New Year's Eve or about paying her own way. Many women would never consider a second date with a man who didn't pay the cheque. You are right about one thing, when you pay your own way you generally are more comfortable having equal say in what to do.

If $150 is too steep for a New Year's Eve bash then don't go. Explain how you feel both about the money and being uncomfortable at a formal affair. However, you must be prepared for the possibility that your friend will go with a different date. I think you should also offer him a choice, and invite him to join you for good company and pizza at home.

It's refreshing to hear from someone independent enough to live life on their own terms and not be concerned how things look.

TURNING GIFTS INTO TZEDAKAH

Students at the Beth Tzedec campus of United Synagogue Day School (USDS) are giving new meaning to the mitzvah of bar and bat mitzvah. Last year, two classes of grade six students approached UJA FEDERATION to establish the HaKesher Fund through which bar/bat mitzvah gifts would go to tzedakah.

Naomi Buck Warshafsky, who coordinates the initiative with Barbara Kirshenblatt, explained that the students chose UJA FEDERATION as the recipient because "the kids realized the value in giving as a community, making a difference as a community." The students were given a powerful introduction to UJA FEDERATION and its beneficiary agencies, starting with a bus mission to local sites. After talks with UJA FEDERATION representatives, the kids had a good grasp of how their donation to the annual campaign would help UJA FEDERATION-supported agencies in the Toronto community and abroad.

The program, scheduled for completion in January 2002 when the last of the students reaches bar/bat mitzvah, has generated such enthusiasm that, according to Kirshenblatt, "the lesson they are learning about community and giving will last far beyond their bar/bat mitzvahs."

Terrific Telethon Totals

The last telethon of this calendar year contributed another $212,000 to UJA FEDERATION Campaign 2001 - The Campaign For Our Children. The campaign total to date is $36 million, which is $4 million or 12% above last year at this time, on the way to an objective of $45 million. Additional donations will be allocated to programs that assist children at risk and bring young people closer to Jewish life.

This year's telethon triumvirate - Super Sunday/ Super Week, plus the October and December telethons – accounted for almost $2.4 million of the campaign amount raised so far.

"Throughout the three telethons, the donors really went the extra mile because the campaign was for our children. And our volunteers made each telethon a family affair, bringing out all the generations to call for our kids," noted Debbie Kimel, who co-chairs campaign telethons with Peter Ekstein and Carole Sterling.

OUTLOOK 2001 looks ahead

Last week, more than 150 members of the law, accounting, high tech and finance communities came together for OUTLOOK 2001, an annual UJA FEDERATION campaign highlight. Chaired by Schulyer (Skip) Sigel (left) OUTLOOK 2001 featured Claudio Morfe, (right) General Counsel for the Nortel Networks Global Professional Services organization.

Singing out for Solidarity

The extraordinary talents of cantors Benjamin Maissner, Ephraim Sapir, Yaacov Motzen and Shloimie Sufrin were rectently showcased at a community solidarity concert for Israel.

The event, at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, was co-sponsored by UJA FEDERATION; Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region; Canada Israel Committee; Beth Tikvah Congregation, Holy Blossom Temple and Shaarei Shomayim.

Nothing stops the journey "home"

Despite recent tensions in the Middle East, thousands of immigrants from the former Soviet Union are starting new lives in Israel.

At the Jewish Agency's Ulpan Meir (Hebrew classes) in Tel Aviv, nearly half of the 500 new immigrants (olim) came to Israel after the current violence began at the end of September. In fact, immigration figures for the last week of November alone rose to over 1200 - more than 100 from the previous week.

Natalya Grukhova, 30, immigrated from Odessa, Ukraine, in October with her six-year old son. "Everything in the Ukraine is chaos," she observed. "I started thinking about the sort of life I want for Zhenya, and decided that, despite all the problems in the Middle East, Israel can offer him a far better future."

Victoria Kravitz, 38 has a similar story. She too, immigrated to Israel from Kharkhov, Ukraine, despite the problems. Kravitz, an accountant, arrived with her husband, her 16 year old son and her parents. "We have always wanted to live here," she said.

Victoria Kravitz

Another participant in Ulpan Meir, Alex Makarovsky, 40, is from Vladimir near Moscow in Russia. "I didn't even think about changing my plans because of the renewed Intifada," he stressed. Makarovsky, a mechanical engineer, insists that life is much more difficult in Russia. "Psychologically, politically and materially it is harder there," he emphasized. "The level of crime and anti-Semitism is far worse than any violence here."

Alex Makarovsky

Olga Pitometz, 25, from Kharkhov, Ukraine agreed with Makarovsky. "I have always wanted to live in Israel. It's coming home even though I've never been here before. But also I saw no future in Ukraine. There was nothing for me there. Israel offers me new hope and fresh opportunities."

The Jewish Agency, supported by the worldwide UJA FEDERATION network, enables Jews from the former Soviet Union to begin new lives in Israel.

Security situation unclear

By DALIA SHEHORI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The situation in the territories and in the region in general is one of uncertainty stemming from a mixture of diplomatic efforts and violent incidents, chief of military intelligence Maj.-Gen. Amos Malka said during the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday.

"The Palestinians are shooting and talking. That is their strategy," he said.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak said that in recent days, the number of shooting incidents against Israelis has dropped to fewer than 20 per day. Nonetheless, he said, the security forces are carrying out "pinpoint operations, and it is clear to the other side that those who cause us harm, will be harmed."

Referring to the northern border, he said the situation is "sensitive, fragile and explosive."

As peace talks resume in U.S.

The prime minister warned that there is intelligence about plans by the radical Islamic Palestinian organizations, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, to carry out attacks against Israeli targets. "It's unnecessary to predict what kind of impact such attacks would have on the peace process," he added.

Barak insisted that parallel to efforts to secure the area, attempts are being made to lower the levels of violence in the territories by alleviating pressures felt by the Palestinian population.

"We are obliged to examine seriously any chance of negotiations," Barak said.

"I never thought they could kill my son"

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Matti Baranovski's room is just as he left it, with all the trappings of a typical teenager: a television and VCR, a boom box in his bed's headboard, next to a Toblerone chocolate bar, near a stack of CDs. His clothes hang neatly in the closet. On the carpeted floor are shoes and a dumbbell he used to build up his swimmer's arms. An honour roll certificate from Northview Heights Secondary School is framed on the wall. A computer is sheathed in a plastic cover.

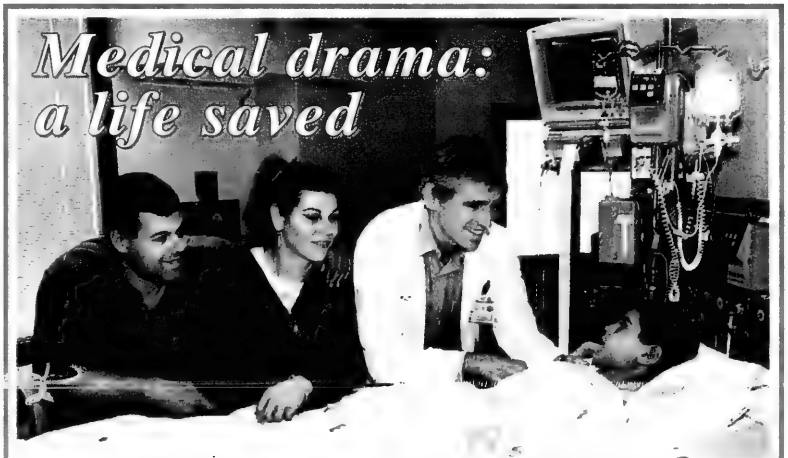
Medical drama: a life saved



Nine-year-old Israeli Arab Amjed Omar, who suffered from chronic liver disease, was hospitalized at the intensive care unit of the Schneider Children's Medical Centre in Israel in the middle of November due to a complete breakdown in his liver function. His mother, Latifa, volunteered to donate part of her liver to save her son's life, but two days before the operation, another suitable organ was found. The organ belonged to Tomer Driham, 18, of Kiryat Yam, who had been killed in a motorcycle accident. The operation, performed by Dr. Eitan Mor of the hospital's liver transplantation unit, was a resounding success. Pictured from left to right are Jalal Omar, Latifa Omar, Dr. Eitan Mor and Amjed Omar. [Israel photo]

The News in Brief

CANADA

Holocaust Day Bill

ST. JOHN'S — Newfoundland and Labrador has become the ninth province to enact Holocaust Memorial Day legislation. The bill creating a provincial day of commemoration and reflection to coincide with Yom Hashoah was passed by the House of Assembly last week. All three party leaders spoke in favour of the measure. Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed the development and said it expects Saskatchewan to pass similar legislation in the coming year.

Zundel's Windfall

TORONTO — Toronto Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel has inherited $100,000 (US) from a one-time public official in the United States. Former Boston assistant attorney general and trial lawyer Richard Cotter, who died in March 1999 at the age of 81, left Zundel, along with other anti-Semitic figures and hate groups, $650,000 of his $5.4-million estate. Zundel's windfall will allow him to continue his "ugly work," said Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress. Despite Zundel's financial gain, he suffered a legal setback last week at the hands of the Supreme Court of Canada (see box below).

Official Apologizes

TORONTO — Two days after her election as chair of the Toronto District School Board, Irene Atkinson apologized this month for comparing the government of Premier Mike Harris to the Nazis. In an interview, she had said that a provincial bill on education was making Ontario "sort of getting to be the state that Nazi Germany was in in the late '30s." In letters to Canadian Jewish Congress and Harris, Atkinson said her comments were "inappropriate and unfortunate."

ISRAEL

El Al Discriminated

JERUSALEM — Israel's national airline was guilty of age discrimination when it forced male flight stewards to retire at age 60, Israel's Supreme Court has ruled. The court rejected El Al's assertion that the demands of the job justify a retirement at 60, five years before the age for other airline staff. Chief Justice Aharon Barak wrote in the ruling that an airplane flight "is not a beauty contest."

Circumcision Changes

JERUSALEM — Israel's health ministry has agreed that hospitals can offer circumcisions performed by doctors, not just by mohalim certified by the Chief Rabbinate. The ruling reverses a decision by former health minister Shlomo Benizri.

WORLD

Canadian Testifies

RAVENSBURG, Germany — Adalbert Lallier, a professor at Concordia University in Montreal, testified in a German court that he saw a former SS second lieutenant shoot and kill seven Jewish concentration camp inmates in the last days of World War II. Lallier told the court last week he couldn't have been mistaken in identifying Julius Viel as the man who pulled the trigger and murdered the Jewish forced labourers after they had dug a ditch against Soviet tanks near the camp at Theresienstadt. Lallier, a native of Vienna, was an SS cadet at the time, and Viel was his superior officer. Lallier immigrated to Canada in 1951. He came forward with his evidence three years ago.

Argentine Leader Dies

BUENOS AIRES — Rogelio Cichowolsky, president of the political umbrella organization of Argentine Jewry, died this month at 57 after a battle with cancer. While maintaining close ties with the government, Cichowolsky was highly critical of the lack of progress in the investigations into the bombings of the Israeli Embassy in 1992 and the AMIA Jewish community centre in 1994. More than 100 people died in the two attacks.

Compensation Ruling

BUDAPEST — A law the Hungarian parliament passed last year to pay $100 to the heirs of Holocaust victims is unconstitutional, Hungary's highest court ruled last week. The court called on legislators to budget a higher amount for victims' relatives. The president of Hungary's Jewish community welcomed the decision, but said it would take at least two more years before legislators act.

Leftist Beats Rightist

BUCHAREST — Former Communist president Ion Iliescu defeated extreme nationalist Corneliu Vadim Tudor in runoff elections for president. Prior to the recent vote, the Romanian Jewish Federation issued a statement saying Tudor had been "a staunch enemy of the Jews" in Romania for years.

Goussinsky Arrested

MADRID — Spanish police last week arrested a Russian media magnate who also heads the Russian Jewish Congress. Vladimir Goussinsky, wanted in Russia for alleged fraud, claims the charges against him are politically motivated. Arrested at a beach resort in southern Spain, Goussinsky is slated to face an extradition hearing soon. The president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Moshe Ronen, called on the prime minister and foreign minister to protest Goussinsky's arrest.

Zundel's Appeal Turned Away

OTTAWA — The Supreme Court of Canada has refused to hear an appeal by Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel – throwing his citizenship case back to a security review agency.

The High Court did not give reasons for its refusal, but the move means Zundel has exhausted a last avenue of appeal in which he sought to prevent the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) from reviewing a Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) recommendation that he be refused citizenship. CSIS had concluded that Zundel is a security risk.

Zundel, who entered Canada in 1958, first applied for citizenship in 1993. SIRC was in the midst of reviewing the CSIS recommendation four years ago when Zundel launched his appeal, arguing that SIRC was biased against him.

It is now expected that SIRC will have to start its review over again, said Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress.

United Church examines relations with Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After more than a decade in the works, the United Church of Canada is releasing a new, pared-down version of a landmark document that is expected to become official church policy in 2002.

The document, entitled Bearing Faithful Witness, calls on Canada's largest Protestant denomination to re-examine its relations with Jews and stop interpreting Scriptures in ways that may lead to anti-Jewish stereotyping.

Last week, Rev. Karen Hamilton, minister of St. James-Bond United Church, and Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec Congregation took part in a dialogue at Beth Tzedec as part of the synagogue's adult education program.

CBC radio and television personality Ralph Benmergui moderated the event.

Rev. Hamilton chaired the Bearing Faithful Witness national steering group. Rabbi Tanenbaum was the Jewish representative (with voting privileges), a position he noted was "remarkable." He has been involved with the project for a decade, first in Alberta, then here.

"I think this tells you something about the United Church and more deeply about the intent of the United Church to create a rapprochement," the rabbi said.

The 1½-page document includes:

- an acknowledgement of Christianity's history of anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism (defined within the document as meaning, respectively, an attack on Jewish ideas and Jews who hold those ideas, and an attack on Jews irrespective of belief);
- a rejection of supersessionism, the belief that the Church has replaced Israel;
- a rejection of all forms of proselytism;
- an affirmation that both Judaism and Christianity have developed from a common root;
- an affirmation that the covenant of God with Israel is irrevocable; and
- encouragement to be vigilant in resisting anti-Semitism and anti-Judaism in church and society.

One of the strengths of the document, according to Rabbi Tanenbaum, is its rootedness in Christian theology that "undergirds the new direction."

Although Rabbi Tanenbaum was lavish in his praise of Bearing Faithful Witness, which he termed "a major step forward," he said he felt a sense of failure and deep sadness over negativity towards Israel and "automatic" support for Palestinians as the "underdog" from certain highly placed "forces" within the United Church.

The rabbi referred specifically to an anti-Israel statement that was being prepared by the Middle East Working Group, an offshoot of the Canadian Council of Churches.

Particularly in light of recent events in the Middle East, he feels Bearing Faithful Witness is weak on Israel. Its sole reference affirms the State of Israel's right to exist in safety and well-being.

"In my own enthusiasm for the positive developments on the Bearing Faithful Witness steering committee, I was too slow in recognizing the forces working against Israel," he said.

"Some of our dialogue partners missed the fact that the future of the Jewish State is not just important, it is the life and death issue for Judaism and the future of the Jewish people," said the rabbi, who bemoaned a lack of balance and context in criticism of Israel.

Regarding Israel, Rev. Hamilton said that everybody in the United Church wants peace more than anything else, but that there are differences of opinion on how to achieve it.

"I believe some of the things that have been said were less than helpful... Some things have not been said that should have been," she said. In the week prior to the event, she said, there has been interfaith dialogue on the subject and "much learning."

Bearing Faithful Witness was initiated in 1988 following a petition that came out of a United Church conference in Alberta. Among the issues wrestled with by thousands of church members who had input, were misinterpretation of Scripture and the Church's complicity in anti-Semitism, noted Rev. Hamilton.

Coping with the shocks

From the editor's desk

Last week in this space, I wrote about the severe shocks to the Jewish psyche that have resulted from the rejectionist Palestinian riots that began late September, on the very eve of Rosh Hashanah.

Those shocks resonate throughout the Jewish world, flowing from the unanswered questions, mostly though not exclusively related to the Middle East peace process that I described as "troubling, even numbing."

The shocks flow also from the uncertainty. If lasting, full peace – which is the constant yearning of our daily prayers – is our true goal, it follows, therefore, that we must be constantly searching for the path that brings us there. But how and with whom?

To date, the Oslo path appears to have brought us only to a dead end. This gap between where we hoped we would be and where we are, along with the distressing fact that we cannot see any reasonable alternative path and the alarming possibility that there may simply not be one in the foreseeable future, lie at the core of the distress we currently feel.

Add to this sense of distress the impact of the related events of the past two months, some of which were itemized in last week's column, and the shocks reverberate within us like an ache between the eyes impairing our ability to see and to function properly, the way we should.

From my vantage point as an observer of Jewish community life, the ache-between-the-eyes appears to be taking its toll on the collective Jewish body politic. Stresses are showing.

Last month, on the front page of The CJN, we published an elegantly-written cri de coeur by Prof. Gil Troy of McGill University in which he poignantly decried "that the Jewish world has been defensive..." in responding to the rejectionists riots. The defensiveness that Troy laments, of course, is but one manifestation of the shocks to the Jewish psyche.

A second manifestation, far worse than defensiveness, are the burgeoning feelings of apathy, confusion, or worse, hostility among many Jews, especially among campus age youths feelings towards Israel.

In addition to these outward manifestations of the ongoing shocks, there is also now an inward manifestation: sharply-expressed dissension within the community.

There are enemies standing at the gate of the Jewish state, as it were, and many within our own community are pointing fingers, finding fault, or harshly condemning both the professional and lay workers who unsparingly give of themselves, their time and their strength in advocacy positions on behalf of the Jewish State.

I am not suggesting that our community workers should be shielded from constructive criticism or from alternate ideas or suggestions that would improve the discharge of their duties. Far from it. Criticism, questioning, even challenging, if done le shem shamayim, that is, not only for the sake of the best result but also in an appropriate, respectful manner, are vital.

Disagreement is not only expected, it is the stuff of debate, and debate is the instrument that develops the best policies. But disagreement must never be the justification for disrespectful, nasty vituperation. Yet aggressive, nasty finger-pointing is becoming more and more the norm within the community. At The CJN, this unwelcome and unhealthy phenomenon is reflected with increasing frequency in the letters about the community's workers sent to the editor. This negative, destructive division in the community serves only the interests of those intent on harming Israel.

Thus, it is vital, in trying to cope with the recent intra-communal stresses, we remember who we are and what we stand for. Regardless of political or religious or any other intra-communal differences, our destinies are linked one to the other in the very same manner and to the very same degree that our pasts are common.

In his essay, Troy went further than merely articulating the negative outward fallout from the shocks. He put forward a number of positive suggestions for ways in which we might try to cope with it. His key suggestion was to "deepen our relationships with Israel" both on an intellectual and emotional level. He urged us through a number of means, to "solidify" our ties with Israel. One especially compelling method Troy proposed was for Diaspora Jews to "adopt" the Israelis who have been killed in the riots. The content and nature of the "adoption" of course, falls to every individual and organization to decide.

To help readers act upon Troy's proposals, I reproduce the contents of the following email message I received last week.

"The [Israeli] Foreign Ministry Web site has established a page commemorating Israeli soldiers and civilians killed in Palestinian terrorist attacks and violence. The memorial page includes the names of all the victims, with links to personal memorial pages for each." The virtual memorial site may be accessed through the Foreign Ministry homepage www.mfa.gov.il.

Coping with the shocks means returning to who we are and must always be.

Toronto Star under fire for Mideast ad

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Muslim-led coalition is angry at the Toronto Star for requiring changes to an ad that called for an end to Israeli "aggression" and "occupation" in Gaza and the West Bank.

The Canadian Coalition for Peace and Justice attempted to place the $14,000 ad in the Star about two weeks ago, but was told by the Star's advertising department that several changes would first have to be made.

"This is an attempt to censor a paid ad," said Mohamed Elmasry, president of the Canadian Islamic Congress and a member of the coalition. "It means the newspaper is taking sides in the conflict."

Elmasry said he received a fax from the Star's advertising department, saying the newspaper's ombudsman, Robin Harvey, required several alterations to the ad. "They started listing too many changes that would abort the idea of running the ad. It was outrageous the changes they requested. It made many people angry," Elmasry said.

The Star denied any attempt to censor the ad. "Confusion" and "an administrative foul-up" were to blame for the incident, Harvey said. "No one, including myself, was trying to suppress the information in this ad."

Harvey, who had been on the job only two weeks, said she didn't want to discuss the Star's internal procedures, but she acknowledged she had asked that the coalition provide sources for the statements contained in the ad. A memo, however, was sent to Elmasry asking that certain items be deleted. "The fax to Elmasry was wrong," Harvey said.

The ad was timed to coincide with UN Human Rights Day on Dec. 10. It ran in the Globe and Mail without any changes.

The ad asserts that "peace will be achieved for all when Israel upholds international law, implements UN resolutions...stops human rights violations, withdraws from the occupied Palestinian territories..."

It cites "300 Palestinian dead" and "more than 10,000 wounded" and asks for support for a "global peace campaign to stop human rights violations in Palestine and end the Israeli occupation."

According to Elmasry, the Star's advertising department requested he remove the reference to the Israeli occupation, remove references to the number of Palestinian casualties, delete sentences asking Israel to uphold international law and UN resolution 242, as well as stop human rights violations.

Harvey said she had scheduled a meeting with Elmasry for Dec. 19 in which she hoped to discuss the "mix-up."

Star publisher John Honderich has also been involved in internal newspaper discussions about the incident and the Star is investigating the incident.

"John Honderich is just as concerned as I am," Harvey said. "Of course people would be concerned that people think we are trying to censor information."

The Star has already offered to run the ad at a discount, she added.

Elmasry said the coalition is asking for a multi-faceted remedy. It would like to meet with Honderich, it is asking the paper to publish the results of its investigation, and to apologize for its "attempt at censorship, which is not the norm in the profession."

Ironically, the Star received a fairly positive evaluation in the Islamic Congress's review of Mideast coverage by Canadian newspapers. The review can be found at the Islamic Congress's Web site, www.cicnow.com. Heading the list for fair coverage was the Globe and Mail while the National Post was placed at the bottom of the Islamic Congress's list. "The Star was closer to the Globe," Elmasry said. "It was a surprise, yes, that they wanted the ad changed."

Media observers in the Jewish community have a far different opinion of the Star. The newspaper has been criticized for favouring the Palestinian side in the current conflict, while many readers have cancelled subscriptions and some advertisers have pulled ads.

Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said "I was surprised" about the Star's attitude towards the ad. "The Star itself is not too far off in saying some of the stuff that's in this ad, in their editorial and opinion pages.

"It seems the Star reserves the sole right to say these things. It's really odd," he said.

The Canadian Coalition for Peace and Justice was formed recently to speak primarily for Muslim groups, Elmasry said. Two MPs, Liberals Mark Assad and Yvon Charbonneau, are involved with the Coalition while a group called Jews for Peace, headquartered in British Columbia, is also a member. Gabor Mate is a spokesman for the group, Elmasry added.

Baycrest volunteer adores her special "ladies"

Volunteer Sharryn Price with one of her "ladies", Margaret Godfrey, at Baycrest's Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged.

After years working in customer relations, Sharryn Price has a special talent for communicating with people, listening to their concerns and making them feel important.

Recently retired, Sharryn promised herself she would devote some time to volunteering. She always knew Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care would be the perfect fit. She loves to socialize and knows there are a lot of elderly people who feel lonely and just need a friend to talk to.

Sharryn comes to Baycrest on Tuesdays and Thursdays to visit with "her ladies". They are six women ranging in age from 70 to 95, all with different health challenges. They live in the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged and The Louis and Leah Posluns Centre for Stroke and Cognition.

Sharryn loves to sit and chat, have a tea, take them to a hair appointment or out for a walk. These are simple gestures, but they mean a lot to those who live in long-term care facilities.

"These women may have little family, or none at all, or their family lives out of town," she says. "Many of their friends have passed on. They've lived long lives and have interesting ideas and thoughts to share, but they need someone to share them with."

Sharryn is a patient and caring person who tries to spend quality time with each of the six women. It takes time to build a friendship and develop a bond of trust, she says. Once that happens, her elderly friends open up to her and share their feelings. It's a very special time.

On this day, she arrives at Baycrest carrying a shopping bag full of goodies for a tea party that she has arranged with her "ladies" and other residents who wish to drop by.

"I want to get a smile out of someone who hasn't had a reason to smile that day," she says. "I make these women feel like they are a valued part of our community."

When Sharryn comes visiting, they do smile!

Montreal massacre victims remembered

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A memorial service held on Dec. 6 – the 11th anniversary of the Montreal massacre – was in honour of the women who died in the massacre, and in recognition of the continued threat of violence against women.

It was co-sponsored by the Holy Blossom Temple gemilut chasadim committee, and the December 6 Coalition, a volunteer organization that raises money to help women build lives free of violence.

The coalition provides interest-free loans to women fleeing abuse to be used for such things as rent deposits, moving expenses, document replacement or deposits for hydro or telephone.

The service began with a reading by Danielle Keystone and Myra White of the names of the 14 women, and of 18 women killed through male violence in the Toronto area in the past year.

Rabbi Daveen Litwin, associate rabbi of Temple Sinai, who lit a candle and recited the memorial prayer, said that yahrzeit candles are not only a symbol of memory and mourning, but a symbol of hope. "They are a strong statement that we believe we can change darkness into light.

"We stand together as a community of mourners and as a community of comforters – a community that can create light.

"We remember the women who died in abuse, but we also hope that we can create a safer world. May this light penetrate our souls as we remember, and commit ourselves to create light out of darkness."

The move from fear to freedom is a continuous journey, said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

"A woman takes that journey every time she [brings life into the world], every time she walks the street, each time she speaks out against sexual harassment, each time she pushes walls that keep women in or out.

"This move from fear to freedom is a sacred journey in the name of compassion. I say a prayer for each woman who dares to believe we will reach this destination in peace."

Rabbi Goldstein acknowledged Karen Loomer, Adrienne Rosen and Donna Keystone who on Jan. 1, are embarking on a 30-day car trip from Tierra del Fuego – 800 miles south of Santiago, Chile – back to Toronto, in order to raise funds for the December 6 Fund.

"These three women are making a sacred journey [of awareness]. They are making the journey as wayfarers to change the world," said Rabbi Goldstein.

Teri Kay, director of family and community service at Jewish Family & Child Services, which includes overseeing the woman abuse program, introduced Shauna (not her real name), a survivor of wife abuse, and said that she "marvels at the strength and will of the women who come to JF&CS for help.

"Abuse is prevalent within our community, and at an event like this, we have to pause and remember."

Shauna said that abuse manifests itself behind closed doors and it perpetuates itself through male violence.

"We must awaken ourselves as a community. We must speak out and tell the truth. All it takes for evil to prosper is for good people to say nothing."

Also at the service, prayers were sung by Rabbi Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple; Sharon Bar-David, cantorial soloist at First Narayever Congregation; and Cantor Anna Trubashnik of Temple Emanu-El.

Blacks and Jews urged to work together

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Blacks were advised "to stand up and kick up a fuss," by Share publisher Arnold Auguste in a recent dialogue.

Speaking at the first function of the Business Network between Blacks and Jews, a breakfast held at the North York Memorial Hall, Auguste also asked Jews for their support.

"We are so afraid of victimization," he said. "If you support us, it gives us a stronger voice."

He called for a return to the '40s and '50s when Jews and Blacks in Toronto co-operated. "We need to do it again, on a different level," he said.

Both Auguste and Jack Mintz, president of the C.D. Howe Institute and a tax expert, told the audience of about 100 that it is worth taking risks to improve the business opportunities of Blacks and Jews.

Canada must deal with "dramatic changes" in the business climate, because an aging population will lead to a reduced workforce, Mintz said.

It will mean more immigration from Asian countries, and Canadians will have to deal with a multinational, diverse population in the next 20 years, he added.

"We have so much in common, yet we are so far apart," Auguste said. "We should build bridges with honesty and respect and we must be prepared for opposition. It's a risk worth taking."

Where we see more clearly

Into the heart of the flame, into the pale blue foundation of the white, upwardly sweeping light is where we should look when we kindle the Chanukah candles this week. Perhaps there, where fire seems calm and insight joins with memory, we will be able to see more clearly the true shape of things. Perhaps there, where the darkness of the inner flame shades the soul, we will also be able to see more clearly the outline of the people who stand beside us.

Chanukah ends this year a mere two days before the end of the secular calendar year. And inasmuch as this is the last issue of The CJN in the year 2000, it may be appropriate to "see" again, reflected in the flame, a small handful of some major news stories of this past year.

Peace for Israel is as elusive as it is precious. For the past three months, Jews in Israel and abroad have been emotionally reeling, wondering if peace with the Palestinians will, or even can ever be achieved.

Elections dominated the headlines this year in Canada and in the United States. In Canada, the nature of the campaign itself was the more compelling story, while in the U.S., it was the nature of the results. As we all know, elections are on the way in Israel. But none of us knows, as of this writing, who the candidates are, or whether the election will be for a prime minister and a Knesset or for a prime minister alone. In Israel, it is the nature of the political system itself that is the key story.

Canada-Israel relations seemed scripted on a page from Alice in Wonderland. In March, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien told a thrilled, appreciative audience of more than 1,300 people at the Canada-Israel Committee's parliamentary dinner that "the security of Israel is foremost among Canada's concerns." There was no doubting his sincerity; he spoke from the heart. Indeed, the following month, as if to underscore his message, he and his wife visited Israel. Yet six months later, when Israel faced a barrage of mendacious accusations at the United Nations, the prime minister's foreign affairs decision-makers sided with Israel's duplicitous accusers. The inconsistency is difficult to understand, let alone to reconcile. This terrain of inconsistency became a great battleground for and even within the Jewish community during the election.

But truth did win out in one very important arena last year. In a stately, dignified courtroom in London, England, Deborah Lipstadt courageously battled David Irving and won.

There is so much to see when we look into the heart of the flames of the Chanukah candles. When we do look, it is imperative that we recall the traditional expression of gratitude to God for having brought us to this day. Only then, armed with that sense of gratitude, and looking into the heart of the flame, will we be able to truly see clearly.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

What would Herzl say?

Israel is never far from an election. Netanyahu's government fell, Barak's government is falling and Israel continues to suffer as the flag of Zionism continues to be perverted for the benefit of those advancing personal interests over those of the State.

The current political machinations taking place in Israel have had a detrimental effect on all those who seek to understand Zionism. That Zionism is engaged in a struggle for its existence is evident. However, the current internecine warfare is not anchored in a principled disagreement but rather in an ego battle that suggests that both leaders have succumbed to the unique pressures of the Israeli electoral map, putting self-interest before public service.

Theodor Herzl articulated a noble vision. What woud he say if he were to witness the strategems and deliberations of the current Israeli leadership? I suspect he would be left speechless, tears welling in his eyes.

CJC's long history in social issues

The Dec. 7, 2000 column by G. K. Simcoe proposes that Canadian Jewish Congress should get involved in social policy issues. Whatever information Simcoe uses is in urgent need of an update. In fact, CJC has continued its long involvement in promoting social policy issues where Jewish values call for action.

We invite Simcoe to contact us to learn of our actions to combat racism and discrimination, to encourage government action on child poverty and to address issues of fairness in the treatment of immigrants and refugees. Indeed, these and other issues were included in out most recent community action guide during the federal election.

Most recently, the CJC National Committee on Social Action held a round table in Toronto to develop means for working with our federation partners in building national action on social justice issues such as poverty in general, the treatment of the elderly and the elimination of child poverty, areas we have long considered important.

Defending Peace Now

Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg's claim (The CJN, Dec. 7) that the policies of Peace Now in Israel regarding the peace process are a failure is not true. A majority of polled Israelis still favour peace talks involving sweeping concessions advocated by the policies of Peace Now, particularly on settlements and Jerusalem.

There are many risks involved in the peace process. For Israel, there are serious causes for concern about the viability of Arafat and the Palestinians as peace partners. However, whether Israel is led by Ehud Barak or Benjamin Netanyahu, it will still end up negotiating with Yasser Arafat.

Rejectionists of Oslo will say, not without justification, that the Palestinians are seeking to weaken Israel "piece by piece" and ultimately to destroy it.

The most relevant question is, can they? According to Israel's military leaders, Palestinians do not pose an existential threat to Israel for the foreseeable future. While few Israelis believe that real peace is going to happen in their time, most believe their security would be more assured with a mutually pragmatic peace settlement setting constraints on both sides.

As far as Peace Now is concerned, the political process Oslo in 1993 has been sullied by Israel as well as the Palestinians. The number of official Jewish settlements expanded by 52.4 percent, not including 42 unofficial settlements in the last three years.

While rejectionists of the peace process raise legitimate concerns about it, they have no answers about what to do with three million hostile Palestinians who are destined to live side-by-side with Israelis in perpetuity. There are only four questionable options to the political path: annexation, occupation, annihilation and ethnic transfer.

For Israelis, the choices are not between bad and good, but between very bad and much worse. As problematic as the peace process is, it remains Israel's only viable strategic option.

Depression not more common in seniors

While I appreciate Mr. Rose's article on my Ada Starkman lecture on depression in the elderly, I need to correct some of his information.

Depression is less common in community dwelling elderly than in young people. Approximately 12 percent of elderly living in nursing homes suffer from depression which is much higher than the general population. Medications are the best bet and the psychotherapies are of little use in severe depression. Financial worries can contribute to depression as can changes in roles but don't cause it. Only serious heart disease causes more impairment in physical and role functioning and days in bed (not hospital) than depression.

Depression is a serious and treatable condition in the elderly and I thank Mr. Rose for bringing it to the attention of your readership.

Internet the new domain of Middle East conflict

By TAMAR HAUSMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The new intifadah is markedly different from the last, or for that matter, from any of the wars in Israel's history: now, there's also the Internet.

Experts on the Internet, anti-Semitism, terrorism and Islamic extremism gathered last week in Jerusalem to discuss the roles that global communication in general and the Internet in particular are playing in the proliferation of anti-Israel and increasingly anti-Jewish propaganda.

The seminar, which focused on confronting online terrorism and anti-Semitism in the Internet era, was hosted by the Anti-Defamation League and the International Policy Institute for Counter Terrorism (ICT).

The involvement of the wider Muslim world in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has been growing for some time, but the Internet has dramatically accelerated this trend. Now, Muslim extremists, even those far from the region, are committing acts of virtual terror from their desks: hacking into computer systems, defacing Web sites, spewing out propaganda to computer screens around the world. The result has already played itself out in hundreds of anti-Semitic (or, more accurately, anti-Jewish) incidents around the world, and experts are even more worried about the future.

'Cauldron of hate'

"There is growing misuse of the Internet. [It] has become a cauldron for hate and violence," said attorney Christopher Wolf, who co-chairs his U.S. firm's Internet practice group and chairs the ADL's Internet Policy Committee.

The misuse includes acts by hackers attempting to destroy or paralyze entire computer systems or Web sites – called cyber-terrorism – and to spread propaganda via the Web – called information terrorism.

Incidents of cyber-terrorism have increased dramatically since the onset of the crisis. Some recent examples include the defacing of Web sites belonging to the Bank of Israel, the Israel Defence Forces, the Knesset and the Prime Minister's Office. UNITY, a pro-Palestinian site, recently threatened to attack Israeli e-commerce sites.

Of course, pro-Israeli hackers have joined in the cyber-war, too. After three Israeli soldiers were kidnapped by Hezbollah on the Israeli-Lebanese border in early October, hackers broke into one of Hezbollah's Web sites, sparking a tit-for-tat battle. Pro-Israeli hackers have also targeted such sites as www.hamas.org, www.pna.org, www.palestine-info.net and three Hezbollah sites. Both sides have attacked a total of over 40 sites since the onset of the crisis.

iDEFENSE, a leading provider of cyber-intelligence and e-security services in the United States, has tracked increased incidents of cyber-terrorism in the Middle East. In a recent report of such incidents published on its Web site, iDEFENSE noted that the nature of a cyber-war is the ability it has to draw in more and more sympathizers on both sides – which is exactly what's happening in this conflict.

"The current Israeli-Palestinian conflict has the potential to pull 'ethical' Arab hackers onto the pro-Palestinian attacker's side because it is seen as a defensive action in response to offensive actions by pro-Israeli attackers. This significantly increases the talent pool on the pro-Palestinian side. The same situation is believed to exist on the Israeli side as well," the report says.

Speaking at the seminar, Reuven Paz, an ICT expert on Islamic movements, said that the Internet is being used by Muslim extremists involved in various conflicts around the world to latch onto the Palestinian struggle for independence in order to advance their own quests for legitimacy and bolster Islam.

"Many more Muslim groups around the world have joined the fight against Israel. They've begun fund-raising for their own causes using Israel as a propaganda target, turning anti-Israel propaganda into anti-Jewish propaganda in order to create and promote Islamic global solidarity," says Paz.

For example, Paz said, Arab Afghans who joined the Chechen struggle have recently begun a fund-raising campaign for the Palestinian cause in order to raise the profile of their own cause at the same time.

Similarly, Muslim rebels in Bosnia, Kashmir, the Philippines and Indonesia have voiced sympathy and/or begun to recruit funds for the Palestinians.

"There is an attempt to combine all these struggles," says Paz, and in particular to appeal to Muslims in Western countries, using anti-Jewish propaganda and strengthen them all simultaneously.

In addition, Paz says, while Hamas' ideology has historically been anti-Israel and focused on the land war, its rhetoric shifted last week towards anti-Jewish when it published a virulently anti-Jewish sermon – delivered in a mosque in Mecca, Saudi Arabia – on its Web site. Hamas and other Palestinian organizations are now publishing more information on the Web regarding Holocaust denial and describing Israeli forces as Nazis than at any other time in the past.

Furthermore, calls for boycotts of American and Israeli products are, thanks to e-mail, reaching more Muslims in more places than ever before, and some terrorist organizations are better able to organize attacks because they too are communicating via e-mail. Whereas during the previous intifadah the Palestinians relied only on pamphlets, television and radio, now, about 20 percent of Palestinian families have Internet access at home, and many more have access at their universities.

Formidable forces

The forces at play, the seminar's participants agreed, are enormously difficult to combat. "Islamic anti-Semitism is new," said Rabbi David Rosen, director of the ADL's Israel office. "It is not rooted in Christianity's 'Christ-killer' idea from the Dark Ages. Instead, it is born out of the territorial conflict. Now, Islam is drawing on medieval Christian ideas that Jews really do seek to kill innocent Muslim children. No one would have dreamt this would have happened in the 21st century."

He continued, saying the Internet "has the capacity to link bigoted, racist, and anti-Semitic fringe groups. They now have the means to come together, spewing forth their filth, galvanizing [themselves and preparing for] action."

Rosen, Wolf, and Paz all agree that there is little that can be done to stymie the cyber- and information wars. In fact, Wolf says that there is an "emerging international trend against regulation of the Internet."

MK Michael Eitan, who also spoke at the seminar, and who chairs the Internet and Information Technology Committee in the Knesset, said that an international body must be established to take action against countries where acts of cyber-terrorism occur.

Melchior and the ADL both believe the solution lies in stepping up interfaith dialogue with Muslim leaders in Western countries.

Minister for Diaspora Affairs Rabbi Michael Melchior – who has previously expressed his concern at the possibility of a worldwide religious conflict between Judaism and Islam as a result of the Arab-Israeli crisis said, "We can't allow people to change the Middle East conflict from a territorial war to a religious war. We have to fight this phenomenon."

The magic of 120

Jonas Plaut, my late father, was born 120 years ago on the 23rd day of August. That figure, 120, is called by Genesis 6:3 the limit of human life, and Moses our teacher died after reaching it.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

To this day, when we want to wish someone a long life, we say "bis hundert und zwanzig," that is, "may you live to 120." It has been pointed out that the number equals the multiple of the fingers on one's hand: 1 by 2 by 3 by 4 by 5.

But back to Dad. Born in a small village of some 500 people and five Jewish families, tucked away in a remote valley of Hessen in Germany, he received an elementary school education with a good dash of Jewish learning.

In time, Dad and an older brother left the village, continued their education and joined the ranks of Jewish teachers, licensed to teach civic and Jewish subjects.

Dad turned out to be not only a good teacher but a true intellectual as well. He put his meagre earnings into books and more books. He had a prodigious memory and could quote large parts of the Bible in the original Hebrew, and when I grew up, I was fortunate to have access to a wonderful library. Dad incessantly urged me to read and read some more.

In 1922, he became head of Germany's oldest Jewish orphanage.

He enjoyed Berlin's good theatre, but alas, none of its operas or concerts, because he felt he was tone deaf and left music to my mother.

We never owned an automobile. Dad and I used to walk to university together, I to my class at law school and he to some important appointment. During these walks, we explored ethical, social and historical subjects. Then Adolf Hitler came to power and I was forced to discontinue working at my chosen profession. Dad encouraged me to attend lectures at the rabbinical seminary, which was headed by Rabbi Leo Baeck.

When I remonstrated with Dad that my knowledge of Hebrew was not good enough for a rabbinical seminary, he engaged a young man to instruct me in Hebrew. It turned out to be none other than Abraham Joshua Heschel, the future great philosopher and, in every way, my lifelong teacher.

After Kristallnacht in November 1938, Dad and Mother managed to immigrate to England, but only after they had taken care of the remaining orphans.

Dad died in the United Sates when he was only 68 years old, but his teachings were sufficient to fill a good 120 years. For me, his memory is as fresh today as it can be, and recently, a great-grandson of his was born in Boston who will be known as Jonas Plaut.

Happy Chanukah.

Enough, Oh God (Or, just Dayenu)

From Russia With Love is a current joint venture between the Jewish Historical Society of British Columbia and the Jewish Family Service Agency.

Russian-speaking volunteers are taping stories of Jews from the former Soviet Union (FSU) now living in the Vancouver area. Eventually the project will mount an exhibit of photos and stories from these interviews. During the course of this project, we have discovered many wonderful people from the FSU who now make Vancouver their home.

Jenn M. Gerber in Vancouver

One of the interviewers, Zanna Linskaia, is herself a journalist. Recently, she sent me an article she prepared in Russian for the newsletter of the Russian seniors' society. She has given her permission for me to excerpt from that article. I believe it gives us insight into feelings and experiences of Jews under the Soviet system.

Zanna writes in her article, Dayenu!:

"I always wondered about one thing – why, through the centuries, did this pathological hate towards Jewish people become inbred in cultures? Russian Jews felt this hate for generations: pogroms in the reign of the Romanovs, 'cosmopolitans' in Stalin's regime, arrests and exile of dissidents in Brezhnev's period.

"In the 1980s a group of 'pro-government' Jews organized an anti-Zionist committee, with writer Tzezar Solodar at its head. I remember his shameful speech on TV where he accused the Zionists of being aggressors. I also remember the confusion of other participants in the studio, famous actors, producers, scientists – all 'Soviet people of Jewish nationality' who were invited to condemn Israel and confirm that in the country of 'victorious socialism' anti-Semitism cannot exist. At the same time activists Ginzburg, Orlov, Rubin and Sharansky were thrown into jails. Enough, Oh God!

"In the Babi Yar memorial, Jews were not acknowledged as victims. During Gorbachev's perestroika it became 'fashionable' and 'profitable' to be a Jew. Between people it was a joke that 'Jew is not a nationality but a means of communication,' and many began to search for their Jewish roots.

"Yuri Sherling was one of the first Soviet Jews who 'made a specialty from his nationality,' as the writer Michael Veller humorously put it. Sherling created Jewish chamber theatre and travelled with it all over the world. In Moscow it was impossible to get tickets to his musical The White Bride for the Black Horse.

"However, the beginning of the collapse of the Soviet Union slightly changed the usual anti-Semitism. 'It is good for you,' the clerk who legalized our visas said enviously, 'And we suffer here,' she proclaimed with anger.

"Still Jews who stayed in Russia believed they were to become at last equal citizens of the country. They opened Jewish schools, centres, synagogues and newspapers. In Tel Aviv the consulates of Russia and Ukraine were opened. Every Russian guest who visited Israel suddenly was slightly Jewish and desired to die in Jerusalem.

"However, when society ran into problems, the cause was found right away: 'Those foreigners, those damned Jews.' Again we could hear the war cry – 'Fight the Jews and save the country!'

"Today, the financial crisis has made the Jewish problem again a popular notion. In Parliament, the nationalists call for the suppression of Jews and Zionists. While in other countries such things sound inconceivable, in Russia people talk about 'good Jews' and 'bad Jews,' yet they claim to be a civilized country. Enough, Oh God!

"Russian Jews, who until now did not want to leave, besiege the consulates of Germany, United States of America, Canada, Australia for visas. After Boris Berezovsky left his position as deputy of Parliament, and mass media millionaire Vladimir Gussinsky was arrested, Jews are now afraid of a repeat of a Night of Broken Glass, like it was in Germany.

"Jews, who saw the destruction and the revival of their world, still have the same entreaty: Enough, Oh God! Dayenu! I have little hope that in the next century we will not need to repeat this prayer."

Generation J

Recently, my wife Nancy and I were in Toronto for the Windsor Law School Alumni Dinner. I came across a book, Generation J, written by Lisa Schiffman, a former associate editor of the San Francisco Review of Books.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

I was intrigued by the pullout quote which graced the dust-jacket: "Call us a bunch of searchers. Call us post-Holocaust Jews. Call us Generation J." After all, I am a post-Holocaust Jew and, as I have often disclosed in this column, I am a searcher – seeking greater knowledge, greater spirituality, greater commitment to Judaism. I must be part of this "Generation J" – whatever that is.

I decided I should find out more about this group of which, according to Lisa Schiffman, I am a part.

After only five pages of reading, I began to hate this book, Lisa Schiffman, and her entire Generation J. She began with her childhood. She writes: "I was embarrassed to be a Jew… I wanted a house where Christmas lights hung outside all year, where the Virgin Mary was immortalized on dishware…"

What kind of Jewish home did this woman grow up in? Well, before long it becomes quite clear that Schiffman grew up in a non-Jewish Jewish home – with parents who could not have cared less about their Jewish roots and, apparently, made absolutely no effort to implant Jewish knowledge or instill Jewish pride in their daughter.

Schiffman makes no mention of Jewish education of any sort; we read nothing of Jewish summer camps, no youth movement stories, no trips to Israel. There is no Shabbat candlelighting, Friday evening family dinner, synagogue attendance, Chanukah dreidels, Purim costumes, Passover seders – nothing, nada, effes!

What an insult to all those parents in places like Sydney (Nova Scotia, that is), where I grew up, who worked so hard to instill a love of Judaism and being Jewish in their children. Schiffman asks: "Are we really Jewish?" I answer: who cares! But I read on.

Next comes – you guessed it – intermarriage! This follows naturally from Schiffman's upbringing. I once had a student who came to me and announced that she was marrying a non-Jew. I asked how her parents – prominent leaders in the Jewish community in another province – felt about this development. She told me that they were quite upset about it. I said that I thought this was not surprising. The student responded: "I really don't why they are so upset. It's not like we ever did anything different from our Christian neighbours."

In any event, prior to her wedding, Schiffman gets it into her head that this might be a good time to become, or at least, display her Jewishness. She goes looking for a rabbi to marry her. Unbelievably, she initially thinks that this will be easy. She, confidently, calls a friend who is a Reform rabbi. The answer: "No. Sorry."

She feels rejected by her religion. She is angry even though she acknowledges that she has, consistently, rejected Judaism. Indeed, her very marriage is one of the most defiant acts of rejection of her Jewishness. Schiffman reacts, "Fk it!" She goes out and hires an actor to marry her. (He played the rabbi in Goodbye, Columbus.) Her mother shouts, "Fantastic!"

To both, I say… Well, you can guess what I said. By now, I am livid!

What follows is Schiffman's self-obsessed, self-indulgent odyssey through the fringes of Judaism. I follow her through flirtations with Buddhism, Jew-Buism, Kabbalah, the Aquarian minyan of the Jewish Renewal movement, and the Centre for Jewish Meditation. As an Internet brand strategist, she tries to come with a brand identity for Judaism.

Schiffman, then, goes native – off to the mikvah, follows this with voice and bodywork therapy – her therapist is the daughter of a high-level Nazi, and then Schiffman has the great honour (truly) of spending some time with Andy Statman, the renowned klezmer musician. In what is probably the most pathetic part of this excursion, she decides to experiment with kashrut – no she doesn't decide to keep kosher. She decides to do just the opposite – eat pork everyday for a week.

How insulting is that! How pathetic! Suddenly, I realize I do not hate Lisa Schiffman any more. I pity her.

At the end of the book, Schiffman prepares to participate in a friend's pagan wedding ceremony. She will be naked but she will have a Magen David painted on her back at the left shoulder. This becomes a visible sign of her Jewishness. Suddenly, it hits me: Generation J – the lost generation. I am no longer angry. I am depressed.

Ehud Barak faces defeat in the next election

Ehud Barak's fall from grace has been nothing short of spectacular. Elected in a landslide victory in May 1999, he resigned last week, his beleaguered government in tatters. Now he faces ignominious defeat in a snap election slated for Feb. 6, less than two years after he triumphantly swept into office.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Once again, Barak's future hinges on the peace process, battered beyond recognition by the collapse of last summer's Camp David summit and the subsequent eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

If Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, throws him a lifeline and a viable agreement is signed that sets Israel squarely on the road toward peace with the Palestinians, Barak may yet squeeze through, whether his opponent is the stolid Ariel Sharon or the slick Benjamin Netanyahu. But if, as seems likely, Arafat disengages from peace talks and the Israeli death toll in the intifadah climbs precipitously, Barak's star will fizzle and the premiership will change hands.

Barak, Israel's most decorated soldier and an apostle of Yitzhak Rabin, rode to victory on the coattails of profound dissatisfaction and disillusionment with Netanyahu, who promised a weary, wary electorate a way out of the Palestinian terrorism that has gripped Israel in its vise since the 1993 Oslo accords.

Netanyahu not only failed to deliver peace and security, his slogan, but was seen widely as a divisive politician of questionable integrity who polarized the country and brought international opprobrium on Israel.

Barak, after trouncing Netanyahu in the last election, turned to fulfilling three campaign promises: withdrawing from southern Lebanon, a quagmire that was likened to Vietnam; reaching a peace treaty with Syria, an intractable enemy; and reviving the spirit of Oslo, all but suffocated by Netanyahu's disingenuous manoeuvres and Hamas and Islamic Jihad's suicide bombings.

Determined to form a representative, broadly-based centrist government of national consensus, Barak invited a panoply of ideologically divergent parties into his One Israel cabinet. When he was sworn in as prime minister in July 1999, he commanded the allegiance of 75 Knesset members. Rabin, by contrast, had a one-vote majority in Knesset when the 1995 Oslo 2 agreement was ratified.

Keeping faith with one of his electoral promises, Barak set out to revive the 1998 Wye agreement. He met with Arafat, who had grown deeply distrustful of Netanyahu, and pledged to do what his predecessor had reneged on: withdrawing from a further 13 percent of the West Bank.

As the Palestinian negotiations wore on, Barak engaged Syria, promising to restart the talks at the point they broke off in 1996. Netanyahu had publicly scorned that condition.

Barak claimed that he could juggle both tracks – the Palestinian and Syrian – at once. In reality, he concentrated on achieving a breakthrough with the Syrians. This tactic led Arafat to accuse Barak of playing one side off against the other.

In accordance with his platform, Barak pledged to withdraw from Lebanon within the context of an agreement with Syria. But it was not to be. Two separate rounds of talks with Syria in the United States, at which Barak and Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa were the chief negotiators, yielded substantive progress but no real demarche toward a peace treaty.

Barak offered to relinquish all of the Golan Heights, save for a strip several hundred metres wide running along the northwestern shore of the Sea of Galilee. The Syrian army had conquered this enclave in the 1948 Arab-Israeli war. No Israeli leader had ever offered Syria so much, but President Hafez al-Assad balked. Intent on pushing Israel back to the June 4, 1967 border, he rejected the 1923 international line as a basis for negotiations. Since there was not a meeting of minds on this pivotal issue, the Syrian track collapsed.

At that critical juncture, Barak decided to vacate Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon, with or without an agreement with Syria. Barak was not keen about a unilateral pullout, but he realized that he had no choice under the circumstances. The withdrawal, sanctioned by the United Nations under Resolution 425, was completed in a precipitous operation on May 24 during which Israel's ally, the South Lebanon Army, literally fell apart in several days.

The flight from Lebanon remains Barak's sole major achievement, and since May, the Lebanese border has been somewhat quiet. But Israelis have been unsettled by chronic rock-throwing incidents orchestrated by Hezbollah, the kidnapping of three Israeli soldiers, a roadside bombing that claimed the life of an Israeli soldier and prompted the Israeli Air Force to launch its first air attack against Lebanon in several months, and the occasional infiltration attempt.

Beyond these incidents, the Lebanese border question has yet to be completely resolved. Lebanon, egged on by Hezbollah, claims that Shabaa Farms (Har Dov), a small area on the southwestern slopes of Mount Hermon, is Lebanese. The United Nations defines it as Syrian territory.

Drawing by Eli Turkienicz

Ehud Barak

In the wake of Israel's pullback from Lebanon, Barak turned his attention again to the Palestinians. Backed by Clinton, Barak called for a summit at which all final status issues – Jerusalem, borders, Jewish settlements, Palestinian refugees – would be put on the table and presumably settled in a historic "end-to-conflict" accord. Arafat countered by demanding a pledge from Israel to settle unresolved interim issues: the establishment of a northern safe passage route from the West Bank to Gaza, the completion of a third Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank, and the release of Palestinian prisoners. Relenting under Israeli and American pressure, Arafat agreed to attend the Camp David summit.

The unprecedented oral concessions made by Barak at Camp David precipitated the slow motion dissolution of his coalition government and the resignation of his foreign minister, David Levy. The National Religious Party and Natan Sharansky's Yisrael B'Aliya faction bailed out before Barak's departure for Camp David. Shas left shortly afterwards, driven out by a school funding controversy and reservations about Barak's conciliatory positions on the peace process. Meretz, his "natural partner," bolted too, fed up with Barak's kid gloves treatment of Shas. (The United Torah Judaism party had already pulled out over a dispute concerning the transport of power station turbines on the Sabbath). Barak, therefore, was left with few core supporters, 30 to be exact, when Arafat walked out of the summit in a huff.

In retrospect, critics say, Barak should have tried for a long-range interim agreement, while leaving the Temple Mount and the Palestinian refugee issues for another day.

Barak was not surprised by the outbreak of the new Palestinian uprising, since Arafat had warned of its imminence. After seven years of talks under the Oslo formula, the Palestinians could point to relatively few accomplishments. They had fully regained only 18 percent of the West Bank. Jewish settlements were expanding, breaking up the contiguity of Palestinian lands. A Palestinian state seemed far off. And partly due to closures, the economic situation in the Palestinian autonomous areas had deteriorated.

The so-called Al-Aksa revolt, clearly used by Arafat to extract still more concessions from Israel, has alienated swing voters from Barak's camp. He will be hard-pressed to regain their confidence should the uprising continue to flare. In general, they regard him as a weak, vacillating leader whose stewardship has been marked by disappointments.

Barak has also lost ground among Israeli Arabs, comprising 20 percent of Israel's population. Thirteen Israeli Arab citizens were killed in nationwide riots immediately after the Palestinian uprising, and Israeli Arabs blame the deaths on a trigger-happy police force. They claim, furthermore, that Barak, until about a month ago, made no genuine effort to ameliorate their social, political and economic problems. In a protest over his policy of benign neglect, Ahmed Tibi, an Arab member of the Knesset, has announced his candidacy for prime minister. If Tibi remains in the race, or if Arab turnout in the election is as low as it was in 1996 when Shimon Peres ran, Barak will pay the consequences.

In addition, due to his opportunistic zig-zag positions on religion and state, Barak stands to forfeit the goodwill of Russian Jews. Without massive Russian support, which he garnered in 1999, he cannot possibly win an election.

Heralded as a saviour after the stagnant Netanyahu era, Barak today is struggling just to remain politically alive.

How the mighty have fallen.

Keeping our waters clean

Rabbinic Reflections

Many months after the ominous poisoning of Walkerton's water supply and its tragic aftermath, the story is finally beginning to emerge. Under the scrutinizing lenses of the crown, the hazy details of nepotism and negligence are coming into sharp focus.

The stark picture of gross mismanagement however doesn't mean that the guilty parties are premeditated killers. Their crime really boils down to a lack of concern and sensitivity for the delicate nature of their responsibilities.

The Ba'al Shem Tov taught us to carefully take heed of our surroundings, always learning its valuable lessons.

The prophet Isaiah once said, "Ho, all who are thirsty come to [drink] water." This advice hardly seems exceptional or profound, much less prophetic.

Our sages clarify his enigmatic statement: Ain mayim ella Torah. The water referred to here is none other than the refreshing life elixir of God's communication to humankind known as Yiddishkeit.

When the pure waters of our tradition become tainted they lose their remedial properties. In fact, they may even place our very souls in mortal danger.

To be sure, if we are to go about cleansing our water supply – "The Holiday Season" might be the perfect place to begin: Chanukah represents the victory of spirit over matter. The glow of the flames we kindle each night represent the superlative power of spirituality vs. gross materialism.

The custom of distributing gelt hails from the very same source: it is an appropriate time to give tzedakah or support children who study our holy Torah without ulterior motives.

Chanukah is not the time to give gifts. Chanukah is not the time to decorate our homes. Chanukah is not the time to send greeting cards. Tragically, for so many, Chanukah has lost its spiritual luster and become the "Jewish Christmas."

Most parents I speak to feel that it would be unfair for the children to come home to a simple menorah when their gentile friends come home to lavishly decorated trees. How ordinary and pale gelt seems in contrast to stuffed stockings and beautiful wrapped gifts. The least we can do is brighten up the home and make it feel like the "holidays!" After all, if the allure of the neighbour's festivities outshines ours, in the end we might lose our children.

In last week's Torah portion we read: "Reuben went in the days of the wheat harvest, and found jasmine flowers in the field." Rashi expounds the emphasis on the time (the days of the wheat harvest): "Despite the abundance of grain, unlike the rest of the children he didn't take that which belonged to others, instead he gathered ownerless flowers."

In this small episode, says the Lubavitcher Rebbe, lies the secret of Jewish survival in exilic conditions. Our father Jacob lived in an environment that was hostile to his ethical morality and values, yet he raised a slew of sons dedicated to his ideals – children who knew they were different.

By benignly allowing the strange tastes, sounds and sights to penetrate and seep into the reservoirs of our heritage we become unwitting accomplices to the poisoning of the sweet waters of our faith. By not steadfastly safeguarding the sanctity and purity of our religion we become as guilty as the public utility commissioners of Walkerton, Ont.

A response to Weinfeld

Guest Voice

This article is in response to Prof. Morton Weinfeld's recent column criticizing the Montreal Vaad Ha'ir's kashrut rules.

Before responding to Prof. Weinfeld's allegations, we would like to review his salient points.

Weinfeld claims the kashrut rules are constructive and invasive, saying, first of all, that the Vaad targets Jewish caterers, kosher caterers who are not permitted to provide kosher food for unapproved venues.

Secondly, Weinfeld says, the fact that kosher caterers are not permitted to serve Reform and Reconstructionist synagogues is characterized as "attacking" their "legitimacy."

Weinfeld then decries the Vaad as "inevitably divisive, pitting Orthodox against non-Orthodox Jews," implying this has negative implications for Israel's legitimacy. He also warns of kosher butchers being excluded from serving secular Jews or gentiles and bemoans Vaad mashgichim invading private homes while "even the Office de la langue française (OLF) resists incursions into private homes."

In a particularly objectionable passage, Weinfeld characterizes the Vaad as Montreal's "kosher police," comparing the Vaad's rules to those of Quebec's "language police" and the Vaad's mashgichim to Big Brother. He concludes by saying that "regulating consumers through enforcement of rules on kosher caterers seems unnecessary and counterproductive."

The comparison of the Vaad Ha'ir to the OLF is contemptible. Kashrut has been a part of our hallowed tradition for millennia and is practised uniformly in Jewish communities everywhere. The Vaad is a supervisory organization, and while police may supervise, supervisors are not police.

As for "invading" private homes, caterers are invariably invited to work in private homes and the procedure for all caterers is that they only work – in their own place, in synagogues, or in hotels – with a mashgiach. In a private home there is no guarantee of the host's kashrut; thus the mashgiach helps avoid embarrassing the host or compromising the caterer. There is no "incursion" and no "invasion."

As for the prohibition against selling meat to non-observant Jews or gentiles, that's nonsense. The Vaad Ha'ir is involved in the laws of kashrut, not with the identity or religious practise of customers.

In bemoaning the Vaad's refusal of kosher supervision in some synagogues, Weinfeld contradicts himself. He agrees that the logical way to enforce kashrut is to refuse certification of venues that violate Vaad standards, yet when the Vaad applies that test to his own synagogue, it is an "attack" on that congregation's "legitimacy."

Furthermore, the Vaad certifies catering facilities at three Conservative synagogues, while there are Orthodox synagogues not under MK supervision. Clearly, synagogue denomination has no bearing on MK eligibility. Any congregation that applies for kosher certification and abides by all Vaad rules is certified. In addition, Weinfeld is fully aware that many major food producers are openly non-Orthodox.

Weinfeld waxes lyrical in describing Montreal's Jewish community's "ahavat Yisrael" and "menchlichkeit," yet he himself should take note of these admirable characteristics before denouncing Montreal's prestigious Vaad Ha'ir. For nearly a century, the Vaad Ha'ir has served the entire Jewish community faithfully and professionally, gaining an enviable reputation for superlative kashrut standards.

While it is true that the Vaad Ha'ir is Orthodox, all Jews without exception – whatever their affiliation or level of observance – receive the same courteous, warm reception. All the Vaad's community's services are guided by the internationally recognized Senior Rabbinical Council, which enjoys the respect of Jews everywhere.

The Vaad Ha'ir has reciprocal agreements with Toronto's Kashrut council (COR), the Orthodox Union (OU), Star K, Organized Kashrus Laboratories (OK) and most other kashrut organizations.

In closing, we quote Weinfeld's own words: "One assumes, one has to assume that [his article] is a well-meaning initiative and not deliberately mean-spirited. But it seems that [his] cure, as reported, may be far worse than the alleged disease."

Absolutely. We couldn't have said it any better.

Jewish Life

Jews and their books

Books
Bernard Baskin

Over the past year this column has drawn particular attention to about 35 recently published books. Despite widespread dire predictions about their demise – victims of technological change – books continue to flourish.

Books of Jewish interest, scholarly and popular, are more available now than ever before. No matter how abstruse or arcane the subject, a book, most assuredly awaits the eager reader.

For Jews, books are especially precious and always have been throughout their history. What other people can boast of teachings such as these contained in the 13th-century Sefer Hasidim:

"If a drop of ink fell at the same time on your book and on your coat, clean the book first and then the garment," and "If a man in straitened circumstances must sell his property, he should first dispose of his jewelry, his house and estate, and only when no other alternative is left should he strip himself of his library." In case of fire or flood, books had to be rescued before all other possessions. "If a man has two sons, one of whom is averse to lending his books while the other does so willingly, he should have no hesitation in leaving all his library to the second son, even though he be the younger."

The books referred to in the previous paragraph were, of course, manuscripts in codex form, because the book as we know it had to wait for Gutenberg's discovery in the mid-15th century.

Religious books when they grew old, frayed or in disrepair were never cavalierly disposed of. They were placed in a synagogue attic or solemnly buried.

Our ancestor's concern for the book was a constant struggle against those that would destroy them. Vast numbers of Jewish books were confiscated and done away with.

After the expulsion from Spain, thousands of Jews fled to Lisbon. There the authorities issued a decree that anyone owning a Hebrew book would be put to death. In Venice, in 1553, in "the Bitter Month," officials burned Talmuds and thousands of other volumes.

So had the Romans, who ransacked Jewish homes and burned their books. Countless precious Hebrew manuscripts and incunabula before the year 1500 no longer exist. Indeed, the complete text of the Babylonian Talmud has survived in only one ancient manuscript.

Cecil Roth reminds us that almost every ghetto Jew, however humble his circumstances and however lowly his calling, was likely to have his modest library. A book was not to him, as to his neighbour, an object of veneration, of mystery, of distrust. It was a sheer necessity of everyday life.

A memorable midrash teaches that when the Children of Israel stood at the foot of Mount Sinai, a hand appeared to descend from the darkened clouds of the heavens. In that great hand rested a book and a sword bound together. God's voice was heard speaking, and the voice said, "Choose, choose."

Every generation and every civilization must choose between the book and the sword. The book is still among the most dangerous of weapons that has been created with which to overcome the sword in human affairs.

Chanukah – part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, the second half of my top eight reasons to travel the Jewish Highway this Chanukah.

Reason No. 5 – The Latkes, of course.

Chanukah would not be complete without latkes. You'll find a huge assortment at the Jewish Food list including good old potato, apple and cauliflower [http://www.jewishfoodlist.com/recipes/hanukah/&hannukah_index.html]. And if you are partial to doughnuts, try out the cheese-filled, chocolate or fried puffs in syrup [http://www.cyberkitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=HANUKKAH]. Over at Berkeley's recipe archive, there's even a recipe for No Fry Latkes [http://soar.berkeley.edu/recipes/ethnic/jewish/indexall.htm].

And while you're frying up your latkes, you can play some appropriate latke music. Don't know any? Then take a listen to La La Latke [http://jewishmusic.com/cgibin/sidedoor.pl?/chkic10c.htm]. Rabbi Gedalia Zweig and his Kiddush Club band have taken Richie Valens' La Bamba, changed the lyrics and created a lively homage to the Chanukah's favourite food.

Reason No. 6 – The Other Foods.

Tired of slathering the same old applesauce or sour cream on your latke? Well, there are alternatives. You can try out recipes for Nectarine & Sweet Basil Compote, Apple Chutney, Sephardic Hot Salsa and Carrot Payasam (made with carrots, milk, sugar and cardamom [http://www.caryn.com/holiday/holiday-Hrecipes.html].

What would Chanukah be without soufganiot, those jelly-filled, oil-fried, sugar-sprinkled, waist-enlarging treats? You'll find several recipes at RFCJ Archives [http://www.cyberkitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=HANUKKAH].

But if you want to look beyond latkes and soufganiot, the Epicurious site will help you put together entire holiday meals [http://www.epicurious.com/e_eating/e04_hanukkah/hanmenus.html]. The Sephardic Chanukah Dinner for Eight will have you dining on Roasted Eggplant and Pepper, Braised Lamb in Pomegranate Sauce and Anise Fritters with Four-fruit Compote. And over at Jewish Holiday Cooking [http://www.sallysplace.com/food/columns/fiszer/hanukah.htm], you'll find recipes for Spinach and Tangerine Salad, Mushroom Barley Soup.

Now, I'm not quite sure about the connection between this concoction and the holiday but hey, it's Chanukah. You can brew your own batch of Adam's Chanukah Ale (with cardamom, cinnamon, oranges, ginger, nutmeg and cloves) and decide for yourself [http://users.rcn.com/apeller/ale.html].

Reason No. 7 – The Parties.

Sitting at a keyboard will never compete with a good Chanukah party. But if you find yourself with a few extra minutes during the holiday, you're invited to one of the biggest Jewish celebrations anywhere. Between Dec. 22 to 29, you are invited to participate in Jewish Web Week [http://www.jww.org]. This is your opportunity to meet fellow surfers from around the world, learn and share about Jewish life and the Internet, and to celebrate Chanukah.

Reason No. 8 – The History.

There are many excellent sites that look at the historical events and the miracles of Chanukah and look at them in more depth than you might remember. For a good perspective, try the Department for Jewish-Zionist Education [http://www.jajzed.org.il/festivls/hanuka/index.html]. The site includes a detailed history of Chanukah along with suggestions for role-playing games and other activities geared toward school classes and youth groups. You'll find 90 more links to Chanukah-related sites at Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=128].

My favourite contemporary Chanukah story is Light in Montana: How One Town Said No to Hate. (The easiest way to find this article is to go to the Utne Reader Online [http://www.utne.com] and search for the word schnitzer.) In 1993 in Billings, Mont., a brick was thrown through five-year-old Isaac Schnitzer's window. The provocation: there was a stencil of a menorah on Isaac's window.

After the investigating officer advised Isaac's mother to remove the religious symbol, the local newspaper published a drawing of a menorah. By the end of the week, Billings, a town with several dozen Jewish families, had at least 6,000 homes decorated with menorahs. One sign read "Not in Our Town! No Hate. No violence."

Thornhill student three-peats in choir competition

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the third time, 12-year-old Cassandra Luftspring has won the Amadeus Choir Carol and Chanukah Songwriting Competition.

Her composition, Dedication, won in the child (14 and under), Chanukah song, harmony, accompanied category. It was performed by the Amadeus Choir at its annual holiday concert, held recently at the George Weston Recital Hall of the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Laura Silberberg, another past winner, received an honourable mention for her L'Kayem Mitzvat, in the same category.

In the past, the competition has had categories for both children and adults. For this year, and every second year after, the competition is limited to children. Alternate years will be open to both children and adults.

Cassandra is in the special arts elementary program at Thornhill's Baythorn Public School. She studies piano, composition and voice at Yamaha Music School, and this year earned first class honours at the Kiwanis Festival.

Cassandra Luftspring

She is also a member of the Toronto Children's Chorus Chamber Choir.

Before she could even talk, her mother Felice said, Cassandra would climb on the piano stool at her grandmother's home and pretend to play.

"A lady came to entertain the kids, and let them play with her keyboard. After she heard Cassie, she told us that she has a natural talent, and we should get her lessons."

Not being "pushy parents," Felice said, they waited until, at the age of five, Cassandra asked for lessons.

They enrolled Cassandra at the Yamaha school, where her talent soon sent her on a special fast track to do a three-year program in two years. At the same time, she supplemented those classes with private lessons.

At the age of eight, Cassandra decided that she wanted voice lessons too.

When Cassandra was accepted to the prestigious Toronto Childrens' Chorus, she was quickly promoted to its senior level. At six, she wrote her first composition, Skating.

"The music she has in her head is beyond what her fingers could do and beyond her technical ability," Felice said.

As a result, Cassandra's teachers helped her score later pieces, such as Jumping Jazz.

Cassandra decided to enter the Amadeus Choir competition "just for fun," she told The CJN. When her piece, Chanukah, won, she decided to try again.

Chanukah Lights, a piece in three part harmony with piano and drum, won the next year.

Inspired by the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel, she composed Celebration, which she played at the 1998 Israel 50 pavilion at the Canadian National Exhibition.

Her six-part harmony piece, Off the Coast of Newfoundland, was a semi-finalist in an international Yamaha contest in Japan.

While Cassandra said that she is seriously thinking of a career in music, she admits, "I might also be a scientist." A gifted student, she is also interested in swimming, skating and art.

Felice said that Cassandra will probably audition for the special arts program at Unionville High School.

The Amadeus choir is in its 26th season. The 115-member choir is the official choir in residence of the George Weston Recital Hall and offers a regular concert series. It features works by both Canadian and international composers.

Relations with Jews examined

"We know the Christian record has not always been very good around issues of anti-Semitism and anti-Judaism," said the minister, regarding the origins of Bearing Faithful Witness. "We are committed to moving forward."

"Every piece of Scripture that has been or can be used in a way that's anti-Semitic, was gone through with a fine-tooth comb," she said. "We wanted to effect real change."

The Church, for the most part, responded with "huge enthusiasm," the minister said. A small minority were not in favour, and some had difficulty grasping the necessity of such a document.

Both speakers, however, stressed the importance of words as well as actions.

This summer, the United Church's general council passed the document as "a direction to continue in," said Rev. Hamilton. At the council's next meeting, to be held in 2002 in Wolfville, N.S., a vote will be taken regarding the document's becoming official policy.

What You Should Know About Visiting Israel

Over the past few months, Jewish Canadians have been asking important questions about travelling to Israel. Here are the answers to your most urgent concerns.

Q. Why is visiting Israel so important at this time?

A. Tourism to Israel has decreased dramatically, striking a severe blow to Israel's economy. Visiting Israel will strengthen the country. It is also a tangible expression of Jewish solidarity when the people of Israel need to know we're there for them.

Q. Should I be concerned about safety?

A. Unfortunately, no country in the world is immune to extremist acts. However, thousands of visitors are travelling safely and securely throughout Israel. Disturbances are generally taking place where few tourists travel. Virtually all popular tourist spots are open, with hotels and tourist services functioning normally.

Q. Have airlines stopped flying to Israel?

A. No. El Al continues to maintain its schedule of 3 weekly flights from Toronto to Tel Aviv, with convenient departures and arrivals on Sundays, Tuesdays and Thursdays.

Q. What are prices like?

A. Right now prices to Israel are the lowest in years. You can book an El Al flight for as little at $999 return from Toronto. El Al is also offering great prices on hotel packages that include your return flight. Now more than ever, Israel is affordable!

Q. After I get to Israel, where should I go?

A. There's more to do per kilometre in Israel than any other destination on earth. Jerusalem offers spiritual richness. Tel Aviv is a whirlwind of entertainment and cultural activities. Haifa climbs from the sea to the majesty of the Carmel Mountain range. The Negev offers adventure and solitude, and Eilat is a Red Sea resort oasis. Israel is the perfect place for a bar/bat mitzvah or to celebrate other special occasions. There's something for everyone of every age and stage in life.

Q. How do I get started?

A. Call your travel agent, El Al Israel Airlines or the Israel Government Tourist Office for detailed information on flights, tours and special activities taking place in Israel.

Israelis said grappling with numerous questions

By REBECCA NADLER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As Israel matures, its people grapple with the question of what it means to be a Jewish state, including the role Judaism and tradition should play in a modern democratic society.

According to Noam Zohar, an Israeli ethicist and philosopher, problems arise when state and faith mix; the question is, what is the right combination?

Zohar, who spoke recently at the Dr. Max and Gianna Glassman Israel Exchange Scholar Program at the University of Toronto, is a rabbi and director of the graduate program in bioethics in the philosophy department at Bar-Ilan University. He is also the co-editor of The Jewish Political Tradition, a four volume work from Yale University Press.

Traditionally minded people, Zohar said, see the Jewish State as a Torah State committed to the laws of Judaism. The basic premise of a Torah State is a commitment to the covenant between the Jews on the one hand and God on the other.

Zohar reflected on the problems that can arise when religion and state collide. Using the recent conviction of Shas party leader Aryeh Deri as an example, he said Deri would not have been convicted in a rabbinical court because a significant amount of evidence against him was from someone who had been granted immunity from prosecution in exchange for testimony. Such an individual would have been considered an evildoer in Jewish law, and his evidence would have been inadmissable in a rabbinic court, Zohar said.

Many Israelis feel the laws of the Torah are incompatible with a modern state. Zohar said there is a general feeling in Israel that rabbis should stay out of politics and maintain a "special" advisory-like position in society, an idea that conforms to Theodor Herzl's original vision of a Jewish State as having an army and a rabbinate excluded from the running of the state.

Using examples from Jewish history, Zohar discussed religious authority and the place of religion in politics. He identified three institutions that held authority in ancient Israel: the priests, who wielded power by controlling the ritual in the Temple; the prophets, who spoke in the name of God; and the kings of the House of David, whose monarchy was established by God.

Yet, in Jewish law, there was never a concept of "the divine right of kings," Zohar said.

As Israelis search to define themselves and try to create a balance in their society between Jewish history and tradition and the secular, democratic world, Zohar feels there is a role for Torah scholars to play.

It's important, he explained, to recognize the complexity of the Torah and tradition, and that Israeli society should be open to the moral and spiritual tradition they have inherited.

Not everybody has the same access to Jewish knowledge or the time to study Torah, he noted. Yet there has been a proliferation of Torah education and, in Zohar's words, a "democratization of Torah knowledge."

He envisions a leadership role for religious scholars, both men and women, who will teach and lead Israeli society with their knowledge but not as a "club of authority."

Women mark 80 years of friendship

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Lilyan Caplan and Frances Levinsky, both 91, have been friends for 80 years.

That's eight decades of weathering life's trials and tribulations and strengthening their commitment to one another. Now, both residents at Baycrest Terrace, they joke that in many ways they are opposites who came from opposite sides of the world.

Caplan and Levinsky met when they were 11 years old, on Nov. 21, 1920, the day that Levinsky (then Bromberg) arrived in Canada from Rypin, Poland with her family.

Caplan's aunt and Levinsky's uncle were married and made a party in Toronto to welcome the new immigrants. Caplan's parents, the Levines, who lived and operated a general store in Wiarton, Ont., came to the party with their family.

Levinsky spoke Polish, Hebrew, German and Yiddish. Caplan spoke English and Yiddish. The friendship took root that first day and the two communicated in Yiddish until Levinsky, who is a fast learner, learned English.

Over the years, despite a number of moves – Levinsky lived in Wiarton, Simcoe near Port Dover, as well as Hamilton, Kitchener and Toronto while Caplan moved to Toronto from Wiarton as a teenager – they met whenever possible. Through childhood, dating, marriages, childbearing and the death of their husbands, Max Caplan, an amateur artist and sign painter and Alex Levinsky, a cap maker, the bond between them grew.

"We may have differences of opinion, but we never fight," says Caplan. "And we were fortunate that after we were married, the four of us liked each other."

Levinsky is outgoing, energetic and perpetually busy, as she has been throughout her life. Once described by a friend as "the energized bunny," she loves to be with people and is involved in numerous community activities, including her most recent pet project, a buddy system at the Terrace which teams up new and long-term residents.

Caplan, on the other hand, says she attends programs but has low energy, requires more rest and is very content to spend time alone.

Levinsky loves to cook and bake and is always sending food to her children. Caplan says she receives food parcels from her children and from Levinsky.

Levinsky is observant and attends religious services while Caplan does not.

But there are similarities as well, says Caplan. "We both had two children, a girl first, then a boy."

They both are Blue Jay fans and often watch games together and discuss strategy and the players.

Most important is their support of each other. It is obvious to the observer that their friendship is based on honesty, trust, sharing, understanding, and above all, love and loyalty.

"When I lost my husband, Lil and Max would always take me places with them," Levinsky says. "And when my Max got sick with cancer, we were there for each other."

Although Caplan and Levinsky have lunch together every day, the two speak to each other on the phone several times a day.

"Memories are a wonderful thing," Caplan says. "And we are always there for each other when we have a problem."

Recently, their two families, including children, grandchildren and a great grandchild, celebrated their 80-year-friendship at a party at the home of Caplan's daughter, Helen Poizner.

Frances Levinsky (left) and Lilyan Caplan celebrate 80 years of friendship. Inset: Lyl (left) and Frances are seen here in 1921.

Poizner told The CJN that "they are the odd couple – but what a team. There is such a bond between them. They have great respect for their differences."

What is the secret of their long friendship?

Poizner believes that "having history is a great bond."

ISRAEL IN A SPECIAL LIGHT

This coming Shabbat Chanukah, December 22 – 23, our community is joining hundreds of others in North America to mark an INTERNATIONAL SHABBAT OF SOLIDARITY with Israel. As we kindle the flame of the chanukiah, the symbol of our spiritual strength, let's stand together with the people of Israel during these difficult times. We'll be spreading the light of Jewish unity around the world. Each evening of Chanukah, when we sing the blessing for miracles "in those days," please remember the miracle of Israel "in our time." As our community marks this INTERNATIONAL SHABBAT OF SOLIDARITY, we pray that peace will be our Chanukah gift this year.

Amnesty International display angers students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A controversial cartoon, displayed recently at the University of Toronto, sparked a flurry of mail and e-mail after two Jewish students happened to see it at Trinity College.

The rendering in question, part of a campus Amnesty International display, shows the foot end of two dead bodies in body bags, side by side on matching tables. One body bears a toe tag marked by a Jewish star, under which is a caption reading Germany 1940. The other, with a toe tag reading "Arab," has the words "Israel 2000" under it.

The university's Jewish Students Union sent a letter to Amnesty International, University of Toronto, requesting immediate removal of the display and insisting on a public apology.

"This cartoon is very offensive," wrote Ron Somogyi, JSU president, along with three other JSUers. "It aids in the propagation of misinformation and misconstrues the factual events in this extremely complex and delicate situation.

"Suggesting that Israel is conducting genocide against the Arab populations minimizes the horror of the Holocaust and other genocidal events in history. Furthermore it does nothing to educate people about such tragic events. Instead it propagates hatred..."

The students also noted that efforts have been made recently to establish and improve connections between Jewish and Muslim student groups. Copies of the letter were sent to U of T president Robert Birgenau, among others.

Janice Stein, director of the Munk Centre for International Studies at Trinity College, also received a letter, because the display was mounted in the centre's John W. Graham Library, which was acknowledged at the display.

Stein e-mailed Diana Juricevic, co-ordinator of Amnesty International at U of T to let her know that it "would be appropriate in the future, to check with people you acknowledge...I had no knowledge of the exhibition. As a rule, when people or organizations are acknowledged, they have extended support in some way."

JSU member Shawn Fried, a signatory to the original letter and the first to bring the matter to the JSU's attention, was "disgusted" when he first saw the cartoon, he told The CJN in a recent phone interview, as he paused briefly from studying for exams.

A fourth-year student, he had never seen anything like it at U of T, he said.

The display ran for 10 days, but the cartoon in question went missing before it was over, according to Juricevic, who acknowledged in a reply to JSU that "many of our pieces are quite provocative...If we felt that the cartoon could be interpreted in such a way as to 'minimize the horror of the Holocaust', then we can assure you, it would never have been displayed," she wrote.

Cartoons, by their nature, are exaggerations, she stressed, noting that they are not intended to be politically correct. "We do not believe, therefore, that by displaying the cartoon, we are 'endors[ing] [a] hateful distortion of fact,'" she wrote.

The organization posted the JSU letter with the display, but by that time, the cartoon had disappeared.

The cartoonist, Shahid Mahmood, a native of Pakistan who now lives in Toronto, wrote in an e-mail to JSU that he is "extremely mad. Under no circumstance will I make an apology."

Ten of his cartoons were included in the display. "The undercurrents of censorship and propaganda are all too visible," he wrote in his formal response.

חנוכּה געדאַנקען

פֿון י. ליפּסי

די ירידשע ימים־טובֿים זײַנען, צום גרעסטן טײל, דער רעזולטאַט פֿון דער ירידשער געשיכטע אין דער תּורה. טוב חנוכּה איז דאָך זיכער פֿאַרבונדן מיט אַ געשיכטע־לעכער פֿאַקטיזדע פֿון אַ געוויסער צײַט, נעמלעך: אַרום 165 יאָר פֿאַר דעם וועלטלעכן קאַלענדאַר. וועג מיד שרײַבן וועגן יענעם פֿעריאָד אין דער וועלט־געשיכטע, קומט אויפֿ געדאַנק, אַז די קריסטן אין מוסלמענער וואַלטן אויך געדאַרפֿט פֿייערן דעם נצחון פֿון אונדזערע מאַקאַבייער. וואַלטן די חשמונאים פֿאַרלוירן דעם קאַמף, וואָלט קיין קריסטנטום אין קיין איסלאָם ניט געקענט געבוירן ווערן אין יענער צײַט. די וואַרצלען פֿון בײדע רעליגיעס זײַנען געווען פֿונעם ירידשן מאַנאָטעיזם. אַבער דאָס איז ניט די טעמע פֿאַרן היינטיקן אַרטיקל. לאָמיר צוריקגיין צום קאַמף.

עס איז ניט אַזוי לייכט צו פֿאָרמולירן בקיצור דעם פּונדאַמענטאַלן אונטערשייד צווישן דער ירידשער אין גריכישער קולטור טראַדיציע. דער אמת איז, אַז ס'איז דאָ אַ געוויסע גיסטיקע קרובהשאַפֿט צווישן די צוויי אָלטע פֿעלקער, וועלכע האָבן אויף אַ באַשטימטן אופֿן באַאיינפֿלוסט דעם וויטערן גאַנג פֿון דער וועלט געשיכטע.

דאָס אָלטע גריכנלאַנד האָט געשאַפֿן די טראַדיציע פֿון דעמאָקראַטיע. אָבער דאָס איז געווען זייער וויט פֿון קולט פֿון געבן געטלעכן כבוד צו מענטשלעכע הערשער. דער עצם פּאַקט, וואָס די אידעע פֿון דער מלוכה האָט פֿאַרנומען אַזאַ צענטראַלן פּלאַץ אין גריכישן דענקען, האָט צוגעלייט דעם באַזן פֿאַרן שפּעטערדיקן קולט פֿון די הערשער אין דער העלעניסטישער צײַט. די מילימעטרישע נצחונות פֿון אַלעקסאַנדער מוקדון האָבן באַזייַטיגט דעם סוף פֿון דער אָלטער גריכישער דעמאָקראַטיע אין דער קולט פֿון מאַכט וועדט אַ צענטראַלער מאַטיוו אין סאַציאַלן אין פֿאָליטישן לעבן. האָבן, דערבײַ, די גריכישע הערשער אין דער צײַט פֿון די חשמונאים געפֿאַדערט, אַז יידן זאָלן אָננעמען די גריכישע קולטור, איינשלישנדיק דעם קולט פֿון געטלעכן כבוד צו מענטשן־הערשער.

Coast to Coast

Post-election commentary, part 2

Last week I examined the state of post-elections relations between the Jewish community and the federal parties, and discussed the situation regarding the Liberal Party and the Canadian Alliance. This week I examine the three other parties.

For its part, the Bloc has always had a cordial, even warm, relationship with the Jewish community. Both understand that there is no possibility of achieving a shared ideology, but the PQ/Bloc has often been supportive of the community, especially with regard to education, social policy and Israel. So the Bloc doesn't have much to do to maintain its links over the next period of time.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

As for the New Democrats, they are in such a state of flux that it would be impossible for them to contemplate strategies for repairing the ties that used to bind a segment of the Jewish community to them. Suffice it to say that currently, there is no relationship between the NDP and the community. The only exceptions would be individual relationships (especially among the elite of both the community and the party) that do not carry over to either the community-at-large or the NDP.

And finally, there is the Progressive Conservative party. Historically, there were always many Jews in that proud party – even as recently as last week. However, in truth, the Tories are no longer conservative and with an accumulated debt of $11 million, the only progress they are making is in drawing closer to financial bankruptcy.

Like all calculating investors, Jews understand when a deal is likely to turn sour. There is little that the Tories can do now to attract increased Jewish support. Moreover, those stalwart Tories who did recruit Jews to the party have long moved on; there are no real points of contact between the two. The best that the Stanley Harts of Canada can do at this point is continue to serve as gently moderating influences on the Alliance. Over time, the core Alliance orientation to issues will become clearer, and in turn will determine whether Jews join the Alliance in substantial numbers.

Our bet is that the Canadian Alliance will become more mainstream and Liberal complacency will become a thing of the past. Whatever the case, the next 24 months promise to be exciting. The only catch is that, as always, if you want to move from spectator to participant, you have to ante-up. Trust your faithful scribe. More than a couple of parties are anxious to fill out your dance card.

Young thespians celebrate Chanukah

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

Four young thespians – Asa Perlman, who plays Ivar Helmer in Ibsen's drama The Doll House at the Canadian Stage Theatre, Mitchell Freed, who stars as John Darling in Peter Pan at the Elgin Theatre, and Jeff Bornstein and Zack Belzberg, who portray two of the lost boys in Peter Pan – told us what they enjoy most about Chanukah.

"We make potato latkes with applesauce, which is one of my favourite things," says nine-year-old Asa. "I like lighting the candles as well. We have never bought a chanukiah – we always make one! One year we made it out of Plasticine. And one year we made it out of wire.

"My dad's parents live in South Africa, so we don't usually get to see them over the holidays," Asa says. "My sister and my brothers and I usually sing in the choir at Kensington Market Festival of Lights. We sing songs and light big torches. It's a lot of fun! I've been doing it as long as I can remember."

Mitchell, 12, says, "When I'm not performing, we go to Florida – where my grandparents have a place – for a winter vacation. We have so much fun there! And Chanukah is usually [somewhere around that time], so we celebrate it then. When we're at home, like this year, my grandma who lives here, makes the latkes and they're really good. We light candles, and get presents – yay!"

"My dad is the one who makes the homemade latkes," Jeff, 12, says. "I love the ones with both sour cream and applesauce on them! For Chanukah we have a big party, and we usually do it buffet-style. Certain guests bring food, certain people bring dessert. It's sort of like a potluck brunch."

"We lights candles, and we have lots of dreidel playing," Zack, 13, says. "I help my parents make the latkes. Once I went to school, and we brought latkes with us, for a Chanukah party with all the kids. At my house, we usually invite a bunch of family and other people over and have big parties… When you come to the show you should look for a kid with red hair!"

Coast to Coast

Matti: One year later

She shows The CJN reporter Matti's kippah, tallit and tfillin. "These were his," she manages in a small voice, stroking the tallit's silk.

Olga Baranovski is doing an admirable job – if one can use that word – of coping. She now works part-time in the food services department at the Baycrest Centre, a job she loves, and is studying toward a provincial certification in cooking, her chosen profession. In between, she works on jigsaw puzzles. The border of a 2,000-piece puzzle depicting Big Ben is almost complete on her dining room table, with a framed photograph of her son within view. But a mother's pain and grief, indescribable and unfathomable, will never leave her.

A little more than a year after her only 15-year-old son was beaten and kicked to death at G. Ross Lord Park at the hands and boots of thugs hardly older than he, Baranovski alternates between barely being able to talk about the event to using language with no frills.

"I never thought they could kill my son," she says flatly of the three young men charged in Matti's murder last Nov. 14 after an argument over cigarettes and money, in which Matti was said to have stood up for another victim.

"They kicked my son like they were adults," his mother says in broken but serviceable English, probably referring to a recent court ruling that two 17-year-olds charged in the murder will be tried as adults. "They are very good actors. Maybe they really are killers…"

> 'They are very good actors'

She pauses and sighs and shifts gears. "They too are sons of their mothers, and they understand that their mothers love them. Why do they not understand me? What did I do? Did I do something to their children?"

Sometimes, Baranovski is forthright. Other times, she speaks quietly, and gently rocks back and forth in her chair.

A recent memorial at the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC) on Rockford Road marked the first yahrzeit of Matti's shocking murder. Last week was equally difficult for his mother: Matti would have turned 17 on Dec. 13.

She sat with The CJN last week in the apartment where she lives with her husband, Elliott Korczak – "the best man I know." For over an hour, she mused on fate, God and being Jewish, which, to her distress, also applies to Daniel Weiz, the 20-year-old Israeli soldier extradited from Israel, the third suspect charged with Matti's killing.

"My mother always told me you have to be the best because you're Jewish," says the 46-year-old Baranovski, brushing blonde locks away from her steel-blue eyes and high, Slavic cheekbones. She reads the Torah, in Hebrew, every day, and is grateful for the outpouring of support and love shown her by friends and strangers.

Sometimes, she wonders what she did to deserve "this punishment."

Does she ever get angry at God?

"God didn't kill my son. People killed my son," she replies, mustering a sudden poise. "I can't understand His way. I believe in my Jewish God. I'm not religious but I believe in God. He's my only friend in the world right now."

Neither is she sorry for immigrating to Canada three years ago from Israel, where she lived for several years after leaving the former Soviet Union. "It's very hard for me to know this happened in Canada because I love Canada. I love my new Canadian friends. It can happen anywhere. But my dream died. Everybody can understand that."

Often, her newfound friends take her out somewhere to breathe and unwind. "They hold me like a baby," Baranovski says, even managing a small smile. Judy Kennedy, the principal at Northview Heights, Matti's old school, who has worked hard speaking out against violence and preserving the former Grade 11 student's memory, gets special praise.

"I love her so much," Baranovski says. "She is the best."

Baranovski taught her son right from wrong, and it worked. Matti was a promising student and set his sights on becoming a doctor. "I taught him," she says, "but maybe the parents of the children who killed my son didn't."

Since Matti's death, there has been a slew of memorials and community fund-raising initiatives. At this month's service marking the conclusion of the mourning period, the JRCC launched a community youth program for adolescents. It will offer teens recreational programs, counselling, computer training, anger management and instruction in Judaism – all designed to keep them out of trouble.

The JRCC has also launched a drive to raise $1 million to build a freestanding drop-in centre for youth, to be named for Matti. It has already hired a rabbi, and is a holding a contest to design the centre's logo.

Baranovski freely co-operates. "I do everything they ask. I give my son's name because if my son was alive, he would approve. He was a friend, and…how you say?…a really nice guy."

She will attend the trials of the three young men charged, as she did the recent hearing held to determine whether the two 17-year-olds could be tried as adults. When the judge ruled they could, Baranovski, sitting with an interpreter in the front row, smiled and shouted "Yes!"

Another thing that keeps her going is her steely resolve to amend the Young Offenders Act, under which the 17-year-old suspects were charged, and thus, cannot be named. "We have to change this law. We will do it. It's time to do it."

For Baranovski, the last year has been a haze. "Our lives are so hard. For every drop of happiness, we have to pay," she says. She alternates light with darkness. "Little by little, I am waking up," she says with a lilt in her voice. But a few minutes later, the darkness: "I am very tired. They killed my soul and my body. They killed me. They killed everything."

United States hosts fresh talks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Palestinian negotiating teams were to conduct unmediated negotiations this week in Washington, D.C., which – if successful – will lead to a trilateral summit meeting next week, an Israeli source said.

The Israeli team includes Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami and Gilad Sher, Prime Minister Ehud Barak's chief of staff.

In a meeting last weekend with Barak, Yossi Beilin, Amnon Shahak and Yossi Sarid, the two main issues were acknowledged to be sovereignty over east Jerusalem and the Palestinian right of return.

"A solution for Temple Mount must be found... Instead of having sovereignty, we are now hostages of that site," Ben-Ami said Sunday in an interview with Army Radio.

"We have to see if Arafat really wants an agreement now that he can claim it was reached through blood and fire, and not through cocktail parties," a source in the Prime Minister's Office told Ha'aretz.

Saeb Erekat, who will be leading the Palestinian delegation, said that "talks of negotiations or a summit before Israel undertakes to end the occupation are nothing but untimely, baseless optimism."

Mohammed Dahlan, head of the Palestinian Authority's (PA) preventive security apparatus in the Gaza Strip, will also be on the Palestinian delegation.

Erekat reiterated the guidelines for any permanent agreement: Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 borders, including East Jerusalem in its entirety; and a solution for the refugees in compliance with UN resolutions.

Before direct negotiations with Israel are resumed, Israel "will have to terminate the aggression and siege on our people," Erekat said in an interview with Voice of Palestine radio. "We will not have peace at any cost," he added.

Any agreement that is reached must be comprehensive, with detailed implementation mechanisms and international guarantees, a senior Palestinian representative told Ha'aretz. "We will not repeat past mistakes," he said.

Outgoing U.S. President Bill Clinton has a mandate to assist in the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, President-elect George W. Bush and Vice-President-elect Dick Cheney told Barak in talks this weekend.

Shlomo Ben-Ami

Palestinian opposition organizations are voicing their opposition to talks with Israel. The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine said it was hypocrisy on the PA's part to renew negotiations with Israel. Several members of the Palestinian Legislative Council called on the PA not to renew the talks, saying the talks would only help Barak regain power but would not bring a just peace.

In Israel there are also those who object to resuming the talks. Referring to Ben-Ami and Sher's meeting with Dahlan in Gaza last weekend, Yesha Council chair Benny Kasriel said that "Yesha children who, on their way to school, have to face bombs and shooting, are reaping the fruit of Ben-Ami and Dahlan's nocturnal 'peace talks.'

"Continued talks with the Palestinians are a green light from the Barak government to Arafat's terrorists to carry on with attacks against Israelis. The Yesha Council demands that these talks of surrender be terminated immediately, and that the IDF be allowed to take its victory," Kasriel said.

The UN Security Council was to vote Monday night on the Palestinian proposal to send observers to the territories. Israel is adamant in its rejection of this proposal.

IDF targets operatives

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The fighting in the territories is gradually changing its character against the background of diplomatic contact between Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA).

Over the weekend, Israeli forces killed yet another Palestinian field operative (the fifth in less than a week) and hit several armed Palestinians from the moment they crossed from Area A under PA control to Area B or C, which are partly or fully controlled by Israel.

Israeli operations in recent days seem to be very much targeted at specific individuals. The number of Palestinians injured during demonstrations has been particularly low, in part because the demonstrations have almost ceased, at least for the moment. Most of the Palestinian dead this past week were armed operatives, some of them members of the Palestinian security forces.

In the 11 weeks of violence in the territories, Palestinian spokesmen tended to present Lebanon as a model to be imitated, both in terms of the goal (a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from the area) and in terms of techniques for achieving that goal (guerrilla warfare, shootings and roadside bombs).

Now it turns out that the Israel Defence Forces has also learned a thing or two from its long presence in Israel's self-declared security zone in Lebanon.

The intelligence information supplied by the Shin Bet on what is going on in the PA, supplemented by information from military intelligence, is very detailed and allows for efficient use of special units to take action against prominent Palestinian field operatives of Fatah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Security situation unclear

said President Bill Clinton will continue his diplomatic efforts with the blessings of the president-elect, George W. Bush, until Clinton's term ends on Jan. 20, 2001.

Barak said that Bush, his vice-president, Dick Cheney, and Bush's appointee to the post of secretary of state, Colin Powell, have sent a clear message to all extremists in the Middle East that peace is an interest of the United States.

The prime minister expressed hope that the U.S. special military assistance package of $450 million would be approved in Congress by January 2001. He said that in recent conversations with congressional leaders, bipartisan support for Israel was confirmed.

Powell vows to keep Middle East on the agenda

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — The Middle East will remain a top American priority in the George W. Bush administration, says retired U.S. Gen. Colin Powell, who was named as the next secretary of state last weekend.

Powell said he would closely follow developments in the region during the closing days of the Clinton presidency.

"It is absolutely a given that under a Bush administration, America will remain very much engaged in the Middle East."

Clearly, he said, trying to strike a balanced view on the Middle East, the United States must also be sensitive to the aspirations of the Palestinians and to Arab states.

He said the two sides in the conflict would have to reach an agreement themselves. If they came up against difficulties along the way, the United States would do what it could to help them, but would not impose a solution.

On another Middle East issue, Powell, who as chair of the Joint Chiefs of Staff headed the U.S. military machine during the Gulf War, said Iraq had not lived up to the obligations of the 1991 truce, which called for Baghdad to account for its weapons of mass destruction and arms technologies programs.

"They have not yet fulfilled those agreements and my judgment is that sanctions in some form must be kept in place until they do so," Powell said. "We will work with our allies to re-energize the sanctions regime."

Bush announced Powell's appointment at a school in Crawford, Tex., calling the general "an American hero." Bush said he was the right person to advance U.S. foreign policy goals, including "to advance peace in the Middle East – based, as any lasting peace must be, on a secure Israel."

Powell, 63, has played a major role in national security councils during the administrations of Ronald Reagan, Bush's father and – for several months – Bill Clinton.

He was treated as a hero after the Gulf War and will be the first African American to be named secretary of state if his appointment is confirmed, as is expected.

Powell was raised in the Bronx, earned a bachelor of science degree in geology from City College in New York, and later an MBA at George Washington University in Washington, D.C.

Rubinstein says political systems 'crippled'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The political systems in Israel are crippled and the administration needs a shake-up and some significant improvements, according to statements made last weekend by Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein.

The attorney general was speaking at a ceremony to mark the opening of the school of government and policies at Tel Aviv University.

Rubinstein said that the judicial system was constantly blocking unworthy budget allotments and political appointments, while protecting civil servants that the political system was trying to harm. Various shortcuts taken by the political system in Israel were prejudicing proper government, he said.

Rubinstein did criticize the judicial system, and even himself, for taking too long to handle cases, but praised the significant contribution of the High Court of Justice to the rule of law.

The attorney general said that over the past decade, the term "High Court of Justice" had been mentioned in the cabinet 4,194 times, adding that a society that needed the law and the courts so much was not a healthy one.

The High Court, Rubinstein said, should be the last and not the first remedy for the ills of the state.

Crisis slows Anglo aliyah only slightly

By CATHERINE COHEN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Aliyah from Anglo-Saxon countries dropped sharply in November, compared to the same month last year.

According to Jewish Agency officials, however, the recent intifadah isn't the cause.

People planning to immigrate have not cancelled because of the crisis with the Palestinians, the Agency says. The 40 percent drop in olim stems from other causes and reflects an ongoing decline in Western aliyah.

The Jewish Agency (JA) reports that only about a dozen Westerners who were scheduled to immigrate over the last two months cancelled or delayed their aliyah. Cancellations are low, they explain, because people who have already made plans to move will not usually change their minds, despite a crisis.

Among potential olim, the main concern seems to be economics rather than security. Since the violence erupted, aliyah emissaries have been faced with questions about the country's economy and job prospects.

According to Akiva Werber, head of the North American Aliyah Desk at JA, cancellations are made by potential olim who have not yet made definite plans.

While there were 70 new immigrants from Canada and the United States in November 1999, a mere 38 olim arrived in November 2000. The same downward trend appeared in Britain, with 59 immigrants in November 1999, compared to 40 this November. Rates of aliyah in October 1999 and 2000 were more consistent, however, with 80 North Americans and 30 Britons arriving last year compared to 75 North Americans and 23 Britons this year.

But Kashriel is hopeful that November's numbers do not reflect a general decline. "The British desk recorded 71 immigrants in December 1999. This year, there have already been 43 olim. I expect the numbers will be the same as last year because we still have applications coming in," she said.

However, Kalman Grossman, executive director of the North American Aliyah Delegation that supervises the team of 11 North American aliyah emissaries, is less optimistic.

"Some 98 percent of people who intended to immigrate in November and December did. But if the situation remains unstable, I believe people will delay and even stop their aliyah process until they are more certain of the future," Grossman said.

"Emissaries encourage potential olim to visit Israel on various JA education programs before immigrating in order to make an educated decision. We have seen many cancellations and postponements for these programs since the violence broke out," he said.

For the past four years, there has been a continued downturn in immigration from English-speaking countries. From January to November 1999, some 1,436 immigrants arrived from North America, compared to 1,204 this year. Aliyah from the UK also dropped from 298 in 1999 and 256 in 2000, while immigration from South Africa declined from 223 last year to 181 this year.

According to official Palestinian 5th grade schoolbooks,

WE'RE ALL SETTLERS

On page 64 of the official Palestinian 5th grade schoolbook titled "Our Arabic Language" #542, the map of Palestine includes the following "settlements": Haifa, Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Ashkelon, Safed, Beersheba, Eilat and everything in between.

Beyond the schools, in the words of the official preacher of Al Aksa mosque appointed by chairman Arafat and the Palestinian Authority: "The Islamic land of Palestine is one and indivisible. There is no difference between Haifa and Nablus, between Lod and Ramallah, between Jerusalem and Nazareth, between Gaza and Ashkelon" (Palestinian Television, Sept 8, 2000).

Which brings up the question: Is the real obstacle to peace the Israeli settlements, or is it the official Palestinian Authority teaching that all of Israel is an illegal settlement?

Ferreting out the true story

Ordinarily burdened with reporting the latest breaking news, it is not too often that a TV news correspondent takes the time to look behind the surface in order to ferret out the truth of a story that, for one party or another in conflict, has acquired the status of certainty.

Neil Macdonald, CBC-TV News Mideast correspondent, did just that in his report of Dec. 11 in examining the case of Issam Judeh, a Palestinian man from the West Bank.

According to Reports

On Oct. 8, following a week of widespread Palestinian rioting, Judeh's body was found beside his mangled car. According to Israeli authorities, Judeh had died in a car accident.

According to the Palestinians, however, he had died from torture inflicted by Israeli settlers in collusion with the Israeli army. There were no eye-witnesses; the only medical report came from the Palestinian hospital in Ramallah which rendered the torture verdict.

The Palestinian version of Judeh's death was promoted as evidence of "Israeli brutality" in the Palestinian and Arab world media. Meanwhile, Israeli authorities attempted to investigate further.

In accordance with Islamic custom, Judeh's family refused an autopsy, which would have allowed independent investigators to establish the truth. B'Tselem, the Israeli human rights organization, called in forensic pathologists from the Boston-based Physicians for Human Rights. Short of having the body to examine directly, the pathologists looked at all other available evidence, including hospital records, X-ray reports, Judeh's clothes, the car, etc.

In a report issued Nov. 2, they concluded that Judeh had indeed died from the trauma of a car accident and not from torture, as Israel had maintained all along. The report was rejected out of hand by the Palestinians.

Macdonald explained that, according to the Physicians for Human Rights, Judeh's case "demonstrates what can happen when evidence is misinterpreted and then used for propaganda purposes."

PM to decide soon on int'l war crimes convention

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak will decide soon on whether Israel should sign a convention for the establishment of an international court for war crimes.

Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami has asked for Barak's permission to sign the convention, but the prime minister said he would first like to hear the opinion of the security establishment, which objects to signing. Israel has until the end of the month to sign.

Signing, however, has only declarative value. If Israel actually wants to join the court, it will then have to ratify the convention, a complex step involving changes in Israeli law. At present, Israel has the option of signing the convention but putting off ratification until a later date.

Ben-Ami met last week with Justice Minister Yossi Beilin, who also strongly supports signing the convention. Both ministers say that Israel must be part of the family of nations that support the punishment of war criminals, and must not distance itself from the court. The two decided to draft a cabinet decision to sign the convention, so that it will be ready on time if their position is accepted.

Israelis and Jews have been involved in the initiative to form an international court since the 1950s. But when the convention to establish the court was approved at a conference in Rome two years ago, Israel's settlements were included in the list of war crimes. So far, Israel has refrained from supporting and signing the convention.

Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein, who participated in the discussion last week, opposes signing the convention, arguing that Israel cannot sign a document that turns its settlement activity into a war crime.

The IDF objects to signing for similar reasons, and has expressed the fear that because of the recent fighting in the territories, Arabs may attempt to have IDF officers and other Israelis charged with war crimes.

Concessions allowed for peace: Bakshi-Doron

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

SINGAPORE — During a visit to Singapore's tiny Jewish community last week, Israeli Chief Sephardi Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron said he's very much in favour of concessions that might bring peace to the Middle East, even if they include relinquishing and conceding parts of Jerusalem.

But Israel must not give up sections of Jerusalem holy to the Jewish people, especially the Temple Mount, he said.

The chief rabbi did not say what parts of east Jerusalem might be given to the Palestinians. He said that he is very much in favour of anything that brings peace.

Bakshi-Doron also called for renewed contacts between Jewish and Muslim clerics to prevent the region's political conflicts from playing into the hands of religious extremists.

However, the current violence must calm down before such contacts can take place, he said. A longtime advocate of Jewish-Muslim dialogue, he initiated a series of secret meetings in the mid-1990s between clerics of the two religions to discuss controversial issues such as the future of holy sites in Jerusalem.

Bakshi-Doron said last week that more of such meetings were needed to create an understanding among all clerics that political conflicts should not be used by the religious to set an agenda for an extremist organization.

The chief rabbi is on a 12-day tour of Australia, Singapore and Hong Kong. Singapore has a Jewish community of some 250 families.

The week in Israel

Dec.11

• Security forces apprehended two Palestinians planning to assassinate Col. Shlomo Mofaz, the brother of the chief of staff, Shaul Mofaz.

Dec. 12

• U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross arrived in Morocco for discussions with Yasser Arafat.

• Palestinian gunmen fired at a group of Israeli children at a community centre in Neveh Dekalim, in the Gaza Strip.

Dec. 13

• The Knesset plans to adjourn Dec. 21 for a special recess to prepare for the upcoming election. The move was designed, in part, to prevent the podium from being used for campaigning.

• Speaking in Egypt, the leader of the international panel probing the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian violence, U.S. Senator George Mitchell, said the panel plans to visit the region several more times before issuing its report. "It is not our intention to inflame the situation. We are not going to point fingers," Mitchell said.

Dec. 14

• Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak endorsed a boycott of Israeli goods "as a result of Israeli aggression against Palestinians." He stopped short of recommending a boycott against U.S. goods.

Dec. 15

• Former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu declared that he would be the Likud's candidate for prime minister only in the context of a general election for the Knesset. In a separate political twist, former prime minister Shimon Peres moved toward declaring his candidacy for prime minister as the peace candidate of the left.

Konrad Kalejs facing extradition to Latvia

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The government of Latvia has requested that Australia extradite Nazi collaborator Konrad Kalejs to face charges of genocide and crimes against humanity.

Latvian prosecutors allege that Kalejs, a former lieutenant in the Arajs Kommando, ordered the killing of at least six inmates who attempted to escape from the concentration camp at Salaspils.

"By these actions, he enabled the camp's administration to create for Jewish inmates living conditions bound to drive them into complete or partial destruction," the prosecutor's office stated when they charged Kalejs.

The extradition request was passed last week to an Australian diplomat based in Sweden. Kalejs was arrested in his home in Melbourne, but was released on bail after surrendering his passport.

Kalejs has been living in retirement in Melbourne after being removed from Canada in 1997 and after being deported from the United States in 1994.

Despite intense lobbying efforts by the Australian Jewish community, Australian authorities have rejected requests to prosecute Kalejs criminally or to deport him. Australia has also resisted calls that it take action against other war criminals. "It's been a total wipe out," said Efraim Zuroff, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Israel office. "There is no political will in Canberra to do this."

Parliament recently amended its extradition laws to allow for the removal of suspects to the countries where the crimes were committed.

Latvia has also been reluctant to bring war criminals to justice. The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has documented 41 cases where war crimes suspects have been "rehabilitated" by the post-Communist government, said Zuroff. The government of Israel, the U.S. Office of Special Investigations and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre have all pushed Latvia to request his extradition.

"That this is happening is a major miracle," Zuroff said. Latvia has resisted international public opinion in the past but "a major objective of its foreign policy is to be a member of the European community and NATO and they see this as a step on the way to membership in NATO and the European Union."

Lived in a North York condominium

Zuroff believes "there's a very good chance he'll be extradited. Australia finally is being given the opportunity to take effective action versus a Nazi war criminal."

Kalejs served as a lieutenant – a senior officer – in the Arajs Kommando, which aided the Nazis in the murder of thousands of Jews and which participated in bloody reprisals against partisan fighters and the villagers. Kalejs also commanded the perimeter guards at the Salaspils concentration camp.

The extradition request relates solely to his role at Salaspils.

Kalejs was removed from Canada after a lengthy immigration hearing. An immigration adjudicator found that as commander of the Salaspils guards, he abetted war crimes and crimes against humanity. During his immigration hearing, which, on and off, spanned two years, Kalejs lived in a North York condominium building that was home to many Jews, including Holocaust survivors.

Following his removal to Australia, Kalejs travelled to Britain where he lived at a Latvian retirement home near Leicestershire. He was removed from Britain when his visa lapsed, returning to Melbourne.

In February and July 2000, prosecutors from Latvia, Canada, the United States, Australia, Britain and Israel met in Latvia to discuss the Kalejs case. A short time after the second meeting, Kalejs was charged.

"We urge the Latvian authorities to take every necessary precaution to ensure the proceedings are not delayed or that the defendant is ultimately spared prosecution for reasons which do not relate to the judicial process," Zuroff said.

Neighbouring Lithuania, which also "rehabilitated" dozens of suspected war criminals, giving them back pay and returning their property confiscated under the Soviets, finally gave in to international pressure, prosecuting two men – one who was so ill he died during the trial and the other who was suffering from Alzheimer's.

Zuroff spoke to The CJN from New York, where he received the Samuel Belkin Memorial Award for the best book on Jewish studies in 2000 by a graduate of Yeshiva University. The book, Response of Orthodox Jewry in the United States to the Holocaust, is a history of the Vaad Ha-Hatzala, a rescue committee that saved primarily rabbis and yeshiva students during the war.

Access Orders for Older Children

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Imagine the following scenario — and, if it hits too close to home, fear not that I am referring to you. Sadly, it happens every day.

A twelve year old boy lives with his Mom. The boy has a healthy relationship with his father, except that Dad is a busy professional whom he does not see as often as he'd like.

While Dad is working long hours, he has an affair with his secretary. Mom is devastated after 20 years of marriage and hard work raising the child and looking after the home. The marriage breaks down. The parents separate and reach an agreement on terms of access and child support.

At first access proceeds normally. However, Mom cannot overcome her grief and loneliness associated with the separation. Notwithstanding financial support, the economic situation of Mom and Son deteriorate. She is simply not as well off as she was before the separation. Mom never complains to her son about his father, but the child is sensitive and feels his Mom's pain.

Child refuses to see access parent

One day, the child simply refuses to see his father. Dad alleges that Mom has brainwashed the child. Mom claims she is encouraging the child to visit Dad, but Son simply refuses to do so no matter what Mom says. The father then obtains from the Court an order to compel the mother to release the child for access visits and, if necessary, to have the police enforce the order. The child still refuses to go and the police visit the Mom's home. The child again refuses to go, and now gets even angrier at Dad for making a bad situation worse. The police then decide to ignore the order and refuse to touch the child, given his age, and tell the Dad to go back to Court. Dad asks the Court to cite the Mom for contempt of Court; i.e. to jail or fine her. He claims the child is a victim of "parental alienation".

Who are we to feel sorry for? The child? Dad? Mom? All three — but we should also feel sorry for the Court, which is now in an extremely difficult position. Often it will ask for an assessment by a child care professional such as a psychologist, psychiatrist or social worker, or have a government lawyer appointed to represent the child's views. At the end of the day and $20,000 later, a dead end is often reached. If the child is adamant about not wanting to see his father, the Court will tell Dad that the child, at his age, must initiate the visits.

Visitation order contingent on child's maturity

If the child was much younger, then the decision would be much easier for the Courts; the Judge might even threaten the wife with jail or a fine. But once most children have reached the age of 12, it is very difficult to compel them to see their "access parent", even if the relationship between them had always been good prior to the separation. (There is no law that specifies a certain age at which a child can say "No." It depends on the child and the individual circumstances of each case).

I believe a creative solution to this conundrum is for the Court to use its broad powers to order both parents to attend a form of mediation that includes therapeutic counselling. This goes one step further than basic mediation, whereby the mediator's goal is to have the parties arrive at an "agreement". Such agreements do not necessarily allow the parties to resolve their emotional problems. Often they simply "paper over" such problems with "terms and conditions", or rules that the parties may or may not follow once mediation is over. In mediation that involves therapeutic counselling, a good therapist — such as a psychologist, psychiatrist or qualified social worker — can help the parties uncover the root of their distress.

Sensitive family law lawyers can play a useful role in this process by helping their clients identify the true source of their unhappiness. Sometimes, it stems not so much from the partner's alleged deficiencies as from a lifestyle choice that led to strain in the relationship.

Focusing on therapeutic counselling

In the aforementioned scenario, Mom should not lose sight of the fact that fatherless children are often harder to raise. Studies have shown that children of sole-parent families tend to grow up with more problems than those of troubled couples who stay non-violent but together. Similarly, Dad has to realize that his conduct, no matter how justified it may seem to him at the time, can create enormous distress for his wife. In turn such distress affects the child. This empathy by children for the custodial parent can sometimes lead to them not wanting to see their "access parent" (usually Dad).

Not until both parents can somehow make peace — not by papering over their differences, but by coming to emotional terms with their actual conflict — will the child benefit. This is extremely difficult for the parents, but it's what's best for the child. It is also the only appropriate solution to this legal quagmire.

On behalf of myself, my family, B'nai Brith Canada and the firm of Basman Smith, I wish you a freilich Chanukah.

City of Vaughan — The City Above Toronto

PUBLIC NOTICE
SIDEWALK SNOW CLEARING

Residents are required to ensure that snow and ice are cleared from the City sidewalk abutting their property within 24 hours after a fall of snow per by-law #300-93. Notwithstanding this, the Council of the City of Vaughan has approved a City-wide sidewalk snow clearing program to assist residents during periods of heavy snowfall. However, this new service does not alleviate residents from maintaining the sidewalk in a safe condition as required under by-law #300-93.

Owners and tenants of property in the City of Vaughan are also hereby notified that by-law #358-86 prohibits the building, placement or maintaining of posts, fences, trees, hedges, retaining wall and wooden or cement curbing on all public road allowance on any roadway in the municipality. This prohibition includes the area between the curb and the sidewalk, as well as the area immediately behind the sidewalk. Any such illegally placed objects that are damaged due to winter road or sidewalk maintenance activities will not be replaced/repaired by the City.

Further information may be obtained by contacting the Public Works Department - Roads Division at (905) 832-8562.

DEPOSITING SNOW ON ROADWAY

Owners and tenants of property in the City of Vaughan are hereby notified that Ontario Highway Traffic Act, Section 181 prohibits the placing of snow or ice on a roadway. Please ensure that any snow removed from your property is not placed on the roadway.

VEHICLE PARKING DURING WINTER SNOW CLEARING OPERATIONS

To allow for a more efficient flow of traffic during winter storm conditions, the City of Vaughan will be actively enforcing its "No Parking" restrictions as permitted under by-law #1-96, Section 4, subsection (7) of the By-law states: "No person shall park a vehicle on a highway so as to interfere with the clearing of snow." In addition, the by-law also prohibits overnight parking of vehicles on any street between the hours of 2:00 am and 6:00 am. It is also an offence to park any part of a vehicle over the sidewalk. This is for pedestrian safety and to help facilitate sidewalk snow clearing operations. Owners are hereby advised that any vehicle found in violation of this by-law shall be tagged and/or towed away. For complete information on parking restrictions within the City of Vaughan, please contact the By-law Enforcement Division at (905) 832-8505.

Mandelbroit served up 'bubbie' style

BY DAVID SEVITT
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Two Canadian bubbies make their debut television performance this season on WTN's Gemini-nominated cooking show, Loving Spoonfuls.

Regine Frankel from Montreal, and Mary Finson, are naturals in front of the camera and veterans behind the apron. With charm and charisma, they teach us how to bake mandelbroit and meatless meatballs in two witty episodes.

Loving Spoonfuls takes the ubiquitous cooking show, dices and chops it up, and offers us a unique gourmet program. Every week a different ethnic grandmother cooks traditional recipes in the comfortable surroundings of her own kitchen.

"Grandmothers are the source – they are the well-spring. When they remember their own grandmothers, the oral history sometimes goes back four generations," says show creator Allan Novak.

Apart from the decadent and delicious dishes that are boiled, broiled or fried, the grandmothers share personal stories from the past, which are both humourous and poignant.

The show's host David Gale has an affectionate rapport with the grandmothers and helps them open up and reveal personal stories, all while cutting, shredding, or slicing.

Sometimes playing the role of the mischievous grandson, Gale occasionally tempts and tantalizes the grandmothers, which adds an edgy layer to the show.

Frankel's episode, which aired the week of Dec. 18, focused on vegetarian cooking. "As a vegetarian you have to be prepared to patchke – you have to be very creative," says Frankel. She is an art expert, a docent at the Montreal Museum of Fine Art , a musician, and a devotee of yoga.

During World War II, she and her family were in hiding in the French countryside. On the show, she tells a poignant story of how she and her siblings played music as the Rubinfeld trio.

During a concert they noticed a row of Nazis in the audience looking at them, and like the von Trapp family in The Sound of Music, the Rubinfeld trio was whisked away before the Nazis could get to them. The episode ends with Frankel breaking into her own accordion rendition of Havah Nagilah.

Finson, this season's other Jewish grandmother, originally from Poland, can be seen the week of Jan. 15. After cooking a traditional brisket, she and her daughter, cookbook author Rose Reisman bake mouthwatering cookies side by side in a hilarious struggle between the old and the new ways of baking.

Finson makes mandelbroit and Reisman makes biscotti, a lower fat alternative. After some humourous mother-daughter cooking rivalry, the oven is opened and out come the cookies. It's unclear who won the competition, but both sets of cookies appear dangerously seductive.

"My mother is a very traditional Jewish cook and does things in a way that is opposite to what I do. She doesn't measure, she doesn't time, she goes more by how it looks and feels. She doesn't have the patience to sit down and look at the recipes," Reisman says. On the show, we learn that Finson never uses her daughter's cookbooks.

To celebrate two seasons of Loving Spoonfuls, the second annual Golden Spoon Awards were held recently in Toronto. The grandmothers who appeared on the show over the two years were awarded Golden Spoon Awards, for their performances and for living full and complete lives filled with love, humour and delicious food.

Loving Spoonfuls can be seen on WTN across Canada several times a week, including Sundays and Mondays at 6 p.m. (EST), Wednesdays at 12:30 p.m. (EST) and Thursdays at 6:30 p.m. (EST).

Veteran actor comes home in Zadie's Shoes

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For veteran actor, Paul Soles, a leading part in Zadie's Shoes at Factory Theatre, beginning in previews Jan. 3, is like coming home.

"It gives me a chance to get in touch with my Jewish roots, to learn where my forebears came from," he said.

Another reason is that most of Soles' work on stage has been outside of Toronto, in Winnipeg, New York and Chicago.

His part in the play as an elder in the synagogue who gives Judaic counsel to a man called Ben has him excited.

Ben, who is played by Jordan Pettle, has gambled away the money that was supposed to finance a trip to Mexico for his ill wife, Ruth. He then turns to the synagogue as a last resort.

Ben's grandfather, who has a gambling problem of his own, is also played by Soles.

Better known to Toronto audiences for his TV and radio work, having been a host of Take 30 on CBC for 16 years, Soles is also known to many theatregoers as the lead in I'm Not Rapaport which played at the Royal Alexandra. He went on to perform the same part in other cities.

Zadie's Shoes is written by Jordan's brother Andrew Pettle of Toronto, who is one of three Canadian writers who have just been commissioned to write a play for an exchange between The Royal Exchange Theatre in Britain and Canadian Stage, where Pettle is a resident playwright.

"It's a very fine play, telling the stories of three sisters and three couples, the eldest sister having a critical health problem," Soles said.

The additional cast of Zadie's Shoes – Paul Essiembre, Kelli Fox, Torri Higginson, Randy Hughson and Juno Mills-Cockell – "are the finest English-language artists in the theatre," he said.

The direction is by Jackie Maxwell, the former artistic director of Factory Theatre.

TORONTO PLAYWRIGHT WINS PRESTIGIOUS NEW YORK AWARD

Twenty-seven-year-old Toronto native Daniel Goldfarb has won a lucrative American competition for his dark comedic play, Adam Baum and the Jew Movie, which was produced one year ago by the Blue Light Theater Company in New York City.

Goldfarb, who resides in Manhattan, won Newsday's George Oppenheimer Award which is given annually to the best New York debut by a playwright. The so-called Oppy Award comes with a purse of $5,000.

"I was thrilled and genuinely surprised at winning this award," said Goldfarb. "The more I learned about this award and the panel who were judging my work as a piece of writing, the more excited I became."

Adam Baum and the Jew Movie tells the story of a Jewish movie mogul of the mid-1940s who hires a non-Jewish screenwriter to write a movie about anti-Semitism. Playwrights Edward Albee, Harvey Fierstein and Wendy Wasserstein were among those on the judging committee. Newsday, a major New York City newspaper, instituted the prize as a memorial to its first theatre critic.

"Picture perfect" Besalu has the only medieval mikvah in Spain

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

BESALU, Spain — When we arrived and got our first glimpse of the Romanesque bridge leading towards a sun-drenched medieval huddle of weathered stone houses perched on a hillside, all I could think of was "picture perfect."

Straddling over the Riu Fluvio, a calm mirror for the bridge and the town to reflect into, the 11th-century bridge offers a fairy tale entrance into this highly photogenic little town, still redolent of the Middle Ages.

The bridge's rounded arches meet their reflection in the Riu Fluvio's waters to form perfect circles. Restored in 1965, it is an enticing introduction to Besalu's other medieval monuments, especially a few interesting Romanesque churches.

We had come to Besalu on a special quest looking for the only surviving medieval mikvah in Spain, one of only three such in Europe. Located not far from Girona – famous for its kabbalists and mystics, home of 13th-century Rabbi Nahmanides – and about two hours north of Barcelona, pretty Besalu was the capital of an independent county in the 10th and 11th centuries, before it came under Barcelona's control in 1111.

We arrived in Besalu at siesta time; and siesta time is sacred in Spain. All official places were closed – we could not even visit the mikvah.

So we took some time to wander through the narrow cobblestoned streets, admiring old houses, typically arched Catalan doorways, colourful ceramics in front of the few stores that were kept open through the siesta, and tree-shaded plazas where one could while away a couple of lazy hours over a cup of thick Spanish chocolate or a glass of light Catalan wine.

Waiting for the Municipal Office to open to sell us tickets to visit the mikvah, I recalled that "El Miqve" was discovered by chance during excavations to find a well.

Located in Placa dels Jueus, the centre of the old Call (Catalan for Jewish Quarter) of Besalu, just around the corner from our much admired bridge, the newly discovered mikvah was officially identified by Rabbi Chilli of Paris assisted by the Rabbi of Perpignan (a town in the South of France).

After archeological investigations, the two rabbis concluded that the building was indeed a mikvah – or Jewish Purification Bath – because it complied exactly with the requirements: access to natural spring water and entrance into the baths with a determined number of steps.

The 12th-century Romanesque stone structure consists of an underground chamber with a 36 step-stairway; in the third step down to the bath, there is an orifice which controls the level of water which is filtered naturally.

Finally, our patience was rewarded: the siesta was over, the Municipal Office opened, and we purchased our 50 pesetas (about 50 cents) entrance ticket. We proceeded towards the Call, entering a lovely park which covers the area where the synagogue used to be.

On one side of the park, a sign guided us towards the mikvah; it read: "Miqwe – Banys Jueus de Purificacio S. XII" (Mikvah, Jewish Purification Baths, 12th century).

We stepped out of the daylight and down the 36 steps into the 12th century. It is amazing how a few steps can transport you into another world. Lit by a narrow window cut through the stone wall, was the mikvah, practically unchanged from over 800 years ago – clear water in a rectangular pool, soft-hued stone walls and stairs, and the quietness of a world long gone.

I stood next to this mikvah, in this little town, in this remote corner of Spain, and I thought of all the generations that had walked into this room, of their lives, of their dreams; and how 15 centuries of tradition and culture were destroyed in 1492, when the proud Jews of Spain were uprooted from their ancestral home and sent into exile.

We were allowed to photograph; but I don't need to look back at the photos to remember the Besalu mikvah. More than any majestic cathedral, more than any resplendent castle, this modest token of everyday, peaceful, traditional life, is imprinted in my memory from a quiet afternoon in a sunny little medieval town where Jews lived for centuries.

Sherman developing play based on None Is Too Many

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Politicians and civil servants did what the Canadian public wanted in keeping Jewish refugees from the Holocaust out of Canada. Some had their own anti-Semitism strengthened by the polls.

This is the thrust of Jason Sherman's play based on the book None is Too Many by Irving Abella and Harold Troper, which was presented in a preview reading at Canadian Stage on Nov. 30.

The play includes scenes in which politicians and civil servants refuse appeals by refugees, citing public attitudes toward Jewish immigration.

One scene describes the appeals made by the 900 refugees aboard the St. Louis, the ship which was also turned away by 12 other countries.

None is Too Many was presented as a workshop in Winnipeg in 1996 but Sherman has rewritten it considerably since then, putting the onus on the Canadian public instead of on William Blair, the then director of immigration.

Between 1933 and 1943, Canada admitted only 4,381 Jews, compared to 200,000 admitted to the United States.

"No free nation took in fewer," one character says.

In an interview with The CJN, Sherman said, "I think anti-Semitism in Canada today is less visible and not so accepted as it was in the '30s.

"Jews had no power in those days, which is not the case today. In the '30s, Jews were not able to enter the professions. Today you don't see signs saying, 'No Jews or dogs allowed.'"

None is Too Many is a powerful play. One particularly powerful moment takes place in the near final scene when the refugees, finally admitted to Canada after the war, imagine they are back in the death camps, where they are asked to put their suitcases to one side, to then go to the right or left, and, in the case of one woman, to undress and have her hair shaved off.

The late Sam Bronfman, then president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), is characterized as a loud, vulgar businessman in search of a senate appointment. Nevertheless, he is portrayed as having a genuine love for fellow Jews, and wanted them rescued.

Bronfman hires the late Saul Hayes as the executive director of the CJC's refugee committee because he doesn't look "Jewish."

In one scene, Hayes tells Blair in furious Yiddish that he cannot and will not help reduce a list of 1,000 French orphans to 500 for political reasons.

But Hayes is a pragmatist and agrees, at Bronfman's request, to tear up a letter to prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King criticizing the latter's "pious expressions on behalf of Jews."

None is Too Many will be further developed before being presented to the public by Canadian Stage.

Larry's Party debuts in Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Barbara Barsky thinks it's fun to play a 19-year-old girl friend and later a mature "woman of certain age" in Larry's Party at Bluma Appel theatre.

As mature Charlotte, she is the third woman to have an intense relationship with Larry Weller, who is the chief character (played by Brent Carver) in Carol Shield's novel, on which Larry's Party is based. The book and lyrics are by Richard Ouzounian.

"Larry has already been married twice, once in the '60s, and once in the '80s to an aggressive woman, so when I meet him in the '90s in Toronto he is ready for a quiet relationship."

Winnipeg-born, Larry is a man who stumbles through life, in search of the man he believes he should become.

"I have a lot of feeling for it because Winnipeg is where I was born, and West Hawk Lake where Larry spent a lot of time figured in my life too," said Barsky.

She has just finished a 10-month run in Fiddler on the Roof at Shaw Festival as Golda, again opposite Carver who played Tevya. She has had other roles with him, too.

Carver is a good friend of Barsky and her husband, Marek Norman, who wrote the music for Larry's Party.

Larry's Party premiere in Toronto with previews beginning Jan. 8, running until Feb.3. The musical will then go on to Ottawa's National Arts Centre and the Manitoba Theatre Centre. During a six-week layoff between the Ottawa and Winnipeg productions, Barsky says she will look for work, but expects to find lots in TV, industrial shows or TV commercials. "At this late stage in my career, I know I'll keep busy."

Rush seats, at half cost, are available one hour prior to show time. For Monday night performances only, Pay What You Can tickets are available in person at the box office. For further information, call 416-368-3110.

Keeping fit said more important than keeping thin

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To maintain health, it is better to be fat and fit than thin and unfit, according to Elliott Berry, chief physician in the Department of Medicine B at Hadassah Hospital.

Berry is also director of Hadassah's Metabolic and Eating Disorders Clinic, and a teacher at the Hebrew University's Jerusalem-Hadassah Medical School.

The Cambridge-educated Berry was speaking at a program at Beth Tikvah Congregation titled Nutrition, Lifestyle and Breast Cancer, co-sponsored by the synagogue sisterhood and Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

This is not to say that it is acceptable to be obese, he said. Rather, what counts are such considerations as ratio of fat to muscle, distribution of fat in the body, and the way in which the body uses insulin.

The International Cancer Research Fund in 1994 said that a diet rich in fruit and vegetables, (he later added olive or canola oil) little alcohol consumption, and a body weight maintained by appropriate diet and exercise, is effective in preventing disease.

While these findings are well known, he said, "less than 10 percent eat enough fruits and vegetables."

There is much research being done into the relation of diet and exercise to disease, such as breast cancer, he said. The findings are complex.

Part of the difficulty lies in the fact that research results must be properly understood and analysed, Berry said.

Certain fats, for instance, especially butter, promote tumor growth in test tubes.

"That doesn't necessarily mean that that will happen in animals or humans," Berry pointed out. Then, tests on animals don't necessarily translate into the same results in human beings.

For instance, he said, penicillin, a wonder drug for people, is lethal to guinea pigs.

You also have to consider epidemiology and the movement of people from culture to culture.

"A study of Japanese ladies showed almost no breast cancer, but high statistics of cancer of the stomach. After they moved to North America, in a few years the results were completely reversed."

Besides, he said, it is difficult to prove causality. "There seems to be a relationship between obesity and television watching – but are people obese because they watch too much television, or do they watch too much television because they are too obese to exercise?"

And what about studies that show poor diet in people with cancer, he asked. "Do people get cancer because of poor diet, or do people change their diets because they have cancer?"

What is really striking, he said, is that test-tube, animal, epidemiological and controlled, retrospective studies show a link between eating fat and developing breast cancer. However, the best, most scientifically dependable study, which takes a baseline and then looks at diet and disease over time, "shows no evidence at all of a link."

It is important also to consider whether fat is distributed above the waist, which appears to have serious health implications, or below the waist, which seems to be less serious.

Effective exercise does not even mean pumping iron every day. "The American Heart association said that a 30-minute walk three times a week will do the trick," Berry said.

Research is also being carried out into the relation between food, mood and disease, he said. A deficiency in niacin, for instance, can cause dementia; people who lose weight often get depressed, and when a person is widowed, his or her life expectancy decreases. "Stress appears to lower the immune system."

During the question period, Berry dismissed many of what might be called "fashionable" theories of disease, including caffeine, pesticides, and aspartame as cancer causers, and organic or totally vegetarian diet as automatic cancer preventers.

Convert to share his experiences

TORONTO — For years, Mark Sanders, an ordained Christian minister, led missionary efforts in the United States, Israel, Lebanon and Saudi Arabia. One of his more successful ventures was Project Kibbutz, an evangelistic scheme to place volunteers on Israeli kibbutzim during the war in Lebanon.

So what compelled him, after more than 20 years of intense involvement in the evangelical world, to renounce his faith in the Christian Gospel and convert to Judaism? After an extended period of study, Sanders realized that the very religion he had once sought to disprove was really true after all.

"I couldn't argue with the Hebrew texts," he says. "I also witnessed the sheer beauty of Torah and Jewish living. Despite the difficulties, I knew I had to walk this path. I had to embrace Judaism."

Sanders' first encounter with the counter-missionary group Jews for Judaism was in 1984, when he attended a seminar taught by Rabbi Bentzion Kravitz in Los Angeles.

"I had just returned from three years in Israel where I'd been networking with various missionary groups," Sanders says.

"Having become fluent in Hebrew, I was already questioning the Christian spin on the Bible. Still, my intention for attending this Jews for Judaism program was to spy on it. Though it would take several years to finally let go of my Christian mindset, Rabbi Kravitz's presentation was a significant catalyst for my spiritual homecoming."

"I thank God for leading me through a very difficult process," Sanders says.

"After all that previous uncertainty and disappointment, I have such a profound tranquility today. Everyday is a priceless gift of discovering the potency of what we have received through the Torah. I echo the refrain of so many other converts and returnees to Judaism: 'It's great to be home!'"

Sanders will be in Toronto later this month to share his experiences, under the auspices of Jews for Judaism. The group's annual Back to the Source lecture will take place Dec. 24 at 8pm at B'nai Torah Congregation, 465 Patricia Ave.

Sanders will also present a special Hebrew language version of this program for the Israeli community on Dec. 23 at 770 Chabad Gate in Thornhill.

On Dec. 25, he will join Jews for Judaism's Julius Ciss and Rabbi Michael Skobac to present an all-day "Counter-missionary Survival Seminar" at Beth Jacob Synagogue, 147 Overbrook Place. Advanced registration is required for this program.

For information about any of these events, contact Jews for Judaism at 905-761-0040.

Premier Bouchard denounces Yves Michaud's remarks

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Premier Lucien Bouchard, personally and on behalf of his government and all Quebecers, denounced controversial remarks about Jews made by Parti Québécois (PQ) hopeful Yves Michaud, and the National Assembly unanimously passed a bipartisan motion similarly condemning Michaud.

But, by the end of last week, the PQ had not blocked Michaud's nomination for the PQ candidacy in Mercier, where a by-election will be held in May, as B'nai Brith Canada and Liberal leader Jean Charest demanded. Michaud had also refused to withdraw or explain his remarks, and was defiantly painting himself as the victim of a witch-hunt. Michaud, known for his bombast, even compared himself to Alfred Dreyfus.

The PQ riding association in Mercier also continued to back Michaud, who is one of three persons seeking the nomination so far.

Bouchard said in the National Assembly that he is "in total disagreement with" Michaud's opinions. "I deplore them, I condemn them and I dissociate myself totally from them." However, he said that disqualifying a candidate is up to the party's national executive committee, of which he is chair. If it does bring the question of Michaud to a vote, he will vote against it. A two-thirds majority is required to quash a nomination bid.

The motion against Michaud was introduced by Liberal Lawrence Bergman and Péquiste André Boulerice.

Michaud was also criticized by Cultural Communities and Immigration Minister Sylvain Simard and Deputy Premier Bernard Landry, who considers Michaud a friend. They both said Michaud's comments amounted to trivializing the Holocaust, although Michaud made no direct reference to that event.

The Mercier nomination convention is scheduled for March 4. The central Montreal seat, which is solidly PQ, was left vacant when cabinet minister Robert Perreault resigned in October.

Michaud, 70, is a veteran hard-line separatist, who was Quebec's delegate-general in Paris during the time of René Lévesque. He was a Liberal MNA from 1966 to 1969, when he resigned over a language law he felt was not tough enough.

BBC and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) applauded the motion and Bouchard's personal stance. BBC, however, continued to insist that Bouchard should refuse Michaud's candidacy.

Stephen Scheinberg, national chair of the BBC League for Human Rights, said the premier should have followed the lead of Stockwell Day, who, during the federal election, asked for the resignation of Alliance candidate Betty Granger after she referred to an "Asian invasion" of Canadian universities.

"The premier seems to have taken the position that our charges were not of sufficient gravity because we refrained from labelling Mr. Michaud as an anti-Semite, but it is not our practice to use words loosely which might open our organization to long and costly legal actions," Scheinberg said. "The premier's failure to act will encourage the strains of bigotry and ethnic nationalism within his party." BBC did call Michaud "a nationalist dinosaur."

CJC Quebec region president Dorothy Zalcman Howard stated that Michaud's "egregious, ill-conceived and mean-spirited attack [is] an affront to all Quebecers... "We trust that Premier Bouchard and the members of the Mercier PQ riding association will exercise the same good judgment expressed today in the National Assembly in selecting their candidate."

The controversy began with an interview Dec. 5 on French-language radio station CKAC when Michaud told host Paul Arcand about a recent encounter with a Jewish senator from Quebec, in which the senator (presumably Leo Kolber) asked Michaud if he was still a separatist.

Michaud said he responded: "I am a separatist like you are a Jew. It took 2,000 years for your people to have a Jewish homeland. If it takes me 10, 50 or 100 years more, I can wait.

"Then he said to me, 'it's not the same.' Ach, it's never the same for them... The Armenians didn't suffer, the Palestinians don't suffer, the Rwandans don't suffer.

"I said, 'It's always you people. You are the only people in the world who have suffered in the history of humanity.' I was a little fed-up."

Michaud then criticized BBC for having sought to change the name of the Lionel Groulx metro station because of his perceived anti-Semitism.

Quebecers, Michaud stated, have never been racist, and he suggested sarcastically that the station be renamed for Mordecai Richler, "a great friend of Quebecers." He joked that René Lévesque Boulevard should be renamed for Ariel Sharon.

Michaud praised Groulx as having been an intellectual leader for two generations of Quebecers, "almost a Québécois idol." He dismissed BBC as an "extremist phalanx of world Zionism."

Michaud waded further into controversy at last week's estates-general on the French language when he told the media BBC is anti-Quebec and "extremely" anti-sovereignist and that it should apologize. He also accused BBC of "interfering" in the byelection. "It is none of [BBC's] business. Is [it] giving orders to Lucien Bouchard? It's curious."

In his presentation to the estates-general, Michaud found fault with ethnic communities' overwhelming rejection of sovereignty. In particular, he pointed to polls in Côte St. Luc where during the 1995 referendum where not even one yes vote was recorded.

Centenarian enjoys regular workouts at the BJCC

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leo Trammer celebrated his 100th birthday at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) Dec. 15 with his usual workout and then joined his colleagues in the health club for a l'chaim.

But instead of wine or liquor, Trammer drank milk, honouring a lifetime rule of never touching alcohol and never smoking.

"I've never been sick in my life," said the centre's oldest member, who works out at the BJCC three or four mornings a week.

"He works out with universal weights every time he comes here," said Grant Smith, athletic director.

Trammer can be seen at three or four different weight stations, where he pushes about 30 or 40 lbs. of weight in sets of 10 reps. Part of his workout routine includes a weigh-in. "He's 100 and he still worries about how much he weighs," Smith said.

Trammer lives alone in his apartment and his only help is a cleaning woman who comes in for three hours on Fridays. His wife, the former Esther Lerner of Montreal predeceased him in 1985.

When he gets up, he spends 20 minutes on a bicycle in his own home before breakfast, to keep in shape.

He makes his own breakfast and supper, having lunch each day at the Baycrest Centre. Spurning Wheel-Trans because of his experience with delays, he takes the TTC bus to the BJCC and to do his shopping at No Frills.

Trammer walks more than a mile from his apartment to a nearby shopping mall, where he does his business and walks home again.

"Usually, seniors who walk with me can't keep up," he said.

Though he has a hearing aid, Trammer can read newspapers without glasses and he speaks clearly. Lately he has had trouble getting his fingers around buttons, though zippers present no problem. He started using a cane for the first time in January of this year.

Trammer said he had his appendix out at age 12 by mistake. "I was at a boarding school that I didn't like and I told my parents I was sick. The school sent me to a doctor who asked me where it hurt. When I pointed to my side, he took out my appendix.

"The only other operation I had was one I insisted on because my mother had a serious stomach problem – even though the doctors thought it was unnecessary. I had one-quarter of my stomach removed with a small malignancy, and I've had no trouble since."

Born in Dusseldorf, Germany, Trammer was one of what he calls the "second-class prisoners of war," refugees who were shipped to Canada from England in 1942.

Trammer came to Canada on a Polish ship, which was held off Newfoundland for two days before the refugees were allowed in. His first internment camp was one in which 273 Jews were held on an island in the St. Lawrence River.

He settled in Montreal where his first job was in a factory making ammunition and metal beds. At the end of the war, he teamed up with another German immigrant (not one of the refugees) and formed the firm, Beacon Sales, which specialized in lighting fixtures. In 1976, they sold the firm to a man who is still running it.

He came to Toronto in 1983 with his wife to join his daughter, Sandra Cayne and her husband Jack.

"I miss my friends in Montreal because I've had a hard time making contacts in Toronto," he said.

One of his most memorable experiences this year was attending the bat mitzvah at Beth Sholom Synagogue of Sandra and Jack's daughter.

He has two more grandchildren. "The oldest one is a head taller than me," he said.

Trammer's parents and one sister are buried in Haifa, Israel, and his only surviving sister is in a hospital there in her 95th year.

"I've been to Israel 20 or 30 times, to visit my sister and the cemetery where my parents are buried," he said.

Ranks of Jewish NHLers down by one

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Subtract one Jewish skater from the list of "who's who" in the National Hockey League and other pro hockey leagues. San Jose winger Ronnie Stern announced his retirement prior to the start of the 2000-01 season.

Injuries are believed to have taken their toll on the 33-year-old following 12 seasons in the league.

In 67 games last year, Stern managed four goals and five assists and spent 151 minutes in the sin bin.

He enjoyed a respectable NHL career, primarily as a rugged fourth-liner who was prepared to duke it out with all comers, regardless of their stature. He worked extremely hard and played a sound defensive game. The six-footer, who weighed in at 200 pounds, came along at the right time, earning $1 million (US) in his last season, despite possessing limited skills.

Like many other tough guys, Stern has an amiable disposition off-ice, belying the head-hunter role he played in the rink.

Stern played 638 games in the NHL, scoring 75 goals and adding 86 assists. He spent almost 35 games (2,077 minutes) in the penalty box.

Other Jewish-players in the NHL include veteran defenceman Mathieu Schneider. The unrestricted free agent was selected by the expansion Columbus Blue Jackets from the New York Rangers, but chose to sign with the Los Angeles Kings instead.

In 29 games this season, Schneider, 31, has fired six goals and set up 13 more. He improved as a rearguard by reducing his disappointing -6 mark last year to +2 so far this season. Schneider will earn more than $2 million this year.

The new kid on the block, Jeff Halpern, is a genuine diamond. The Washington Capitals' 24-year-old centre had an outstanding rookie season in 1999-00, scoring 18 goals with 11 assists. This year he's scored five goals, and seven assists in 28 games.

The Princeton grad, who was undrafted, was a walk-on and it wasn't long before coach Ron Wilson noted his dedication as an athlete along with his leadership qualities. His solid two-way game forced the Caps to keep him around.

While he is described as having a "modest offensive upside," Halpern maintained a more-than-respectable 1.08 points-per-game average in four years at Princeton.

In his final year in college, the six-foot, 195-pounder scored 22 goals and added 22 helpers in only 33 games. He was recognized with a nomination for the Hobey Baker Award, presented to the best player in U.S. collegiate hockey.

Halpern led the Caps last season with four short-handed goals, which was third-best in the league. Not surprising, since scouts describe Halpern as "speedy, tenacious and an excellent two-way player with poise and versatility."

Hard working Steve Dubinsky, also an unrestricted free agent, changed teams in the pre-season. Following a very disappointing and injury-filled season with the Calgary Flames, where he managed a single assist in 23 games, the 30-year-old signed with his former team, the Chicago Blackhawks. He is a versatile forward who plays a grinding style of hockey. In eight games he's registered one assist.

Some 'Post' election musings

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

The media are biased against Israel. I wish I had the proverbial nickel for every time I've heard this. But what happens when a media outlet is biased in favour of Israel – and uses the Jewish state as a club to pummel a sitting domestic government it openly detests? Does anyone resent that?

The agenda at the National Post is plain. As a shill for the Canadian Alliance, its entire raison d'etre is to see a tax-slashing, right-wing government installed in Ottawa. Its stories on creeping socialism and the brain drain have one purpose: to yank the Liberals away from the controls. The contempt its part-owner Conrad Black (aka Lord Almost) has for Jean Chrétien is no secret.

Included of late in the paper's arsenal is Israel. Now, along comes another screed from Post editorialist Ezra Levant, who heaps scorn on the Liberals (surprise) for supporting a recent raft of anti-Israel resolutions at the United Nations, and on the Jewish "establishment" for marching lock step with said Liberals, from whom they receive public largess in the form of government grants.

Levant also takes The CJN to task for purportedly worshipping at the Grit altar: on the week the UN's Security Council passed, with Canada's support, the infamous Resolution 1322 that condemned Israel for using excessive force against Palestinians, this paper chose to run a front-page tribute to Pierre Trudeau, he observes (ignoring a weekly's often frustrating publication machinations, and a front-page editorial on the subject in our Oct. 19 edition).

I have some questions for the Post's editors.

On Nov. 24, the paper ran a banner headline, "Canada Fighting Israel at UN," and breathlessly reported that Ottawa had supported 10 of 12 anti-Israel resolutions at lower-level UN committees. This despite the fact the Liberals had scrambled to placate an outraged Jewish community following 1322, with the prime minister himself issuing an unprecedented letter of contrition, of sorts.

What the paper did not report is that these votes took place on Nov. 10. As the Jewish Western Bulletin in Vancouver dryly observed recently, if this story was important enough to merit page one, above-the-fold placement, why was it not run in a timely manner, say on the 11th?

The answer? The Post sat on the story until the last business day before the Nov. 27 federal election, and on a Friday yet, giving Jews plenty to discuss in synagogues that night and the next day. It was a mischievous, political plant that used Jews and Israel like a crowbar, and was run when it was bound to have the greatest impact on Jewish voters and Jewish Alliance candidates alike. As a final touché, the paper did not run a letter from Foreign Minister John Manley, in which he alleged the story made "several false assertions."

In his Dec. 11 polemic, Levant wrote, referring to what he perceived as Jewish support for the status quo: "But for the Jewish establishment to apologize for the Liberals and to pile on the Alliance can only be explained by partisanship in the community's top ranks…"

Let's substitute a few words and see how it hangs together: "But for the (media) establishment to apologize for the (Alliance) and to pile on the (Liberals) can only be explained by partisanship in the (media's) top ranks." Fits, no?

All the Jewish Alliance candidates in this election were soundly defeated. Perhaps that shows Jewish voters are savvy enough to recognize sky-is-falling alarmism when they hear it. And when they read it?

But let's not attach too much importance to the Post. The real story here is Canada's dismal and hypocritical voting record at the UN. Now here's a public service you can use: Canada's mission to the world body may be contacted at 212-848-1100; fax, 212-848-1195; e-mail, canada@un.int

בימי מתתיהו בן יוחנן כהן גדול חשמונאי ובניו כשעמדה מלכות יון הרשעה על עמך ישראל להשכיחם תורתיך ולהעבירם מחקי רצונך ואתה ברחמיך הרבים עמדת להם בעת צרתם רבת את ריבם דנת את דינם נקמת את נקמתם מסרת גבורים ביד חלשים ורבים ביד מעטים וטמאים ביד טהורים ורשעים ביד צדיקים וזדים ביד עוסקי תורתך ולך עשית שם גדול וקדוש בעולמך ולעמך ישראל עשית תשועה גדולה ופורקן כהיום הזה ואחר כן באו בניך לדביר ביתך ופינו את היכלך וטהרו את מקדשך והדליקו נרות בהצרות קדשך וקבעו שמונת ימי חנוכה אלו להודות

In the days of the High Priest Mattathias, son of Jochanan, of the Hasmonean family, a tyrannical power rose up against Your people Israel to compel them to forsake Your Torah, and to force them to transgress against Your commandments. In Your abundant mercy You did stand by your people in time of distress. You rose to their defence and vindicated their cause. You brought retribution upon the evildoers, delivering the strong into the hands of the weaker, the many into the hands of the few, the wicked into the hands of the just and the arrogant into the hands of those devoted to Your Torah. Thus, did You make Your greatness and holiness known in Your world and rescue Your people, Israel, even as you do today. Afterward, Your children came into Your dwelling place, cleansed the Temple, purified the sanctuary, lit candles in the holy courtyard and designated these eight days as rededication – Chanukah – to give thanks and praise unto Your Great Name.

Chanukah, the affirmation of honour

At the suggestion of a CJN reader, we reproduce in this year's Chanukah greetings supplement Hannah Senesh's poem Blessed is the Match. Its association with Chanukah revolves around the aspect of "flame" which is at the centre of the four-fold progression in the poem that leads from a simple instrument of flame to one of humanity's highest virtues: the affirmation of human honour.

Indeed the affirmation of human honour is at the core of the holiday of Chanukah. The holiday commemorates the successful struggle of the Jewish people almost 2,500 years ago in the land of Israel to live, simply, as Jews, practising their faith, observing their laws, teaching their traditions to the next generation, honourably.

We hope our readers will enjoy the diverse mixture of offerings that appear in this supplement.

The CJN is also delighted to publish for the third consecutive year, the winning photos of the Israel Experience photo contest.

Blessed is the Match

Blessed is the match consumed in kindling flame.
Blessed is the flame that burns in the secret fastness of the heart
Blessed is the heart with strength to stop its beating for honour's sake.
Blessed is the match consumed in kindling flame.

More than meets the eye in Ma'oz Tsur

By JONATHAN GRONER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The sages of the Mishnah said about the Torah, "Turn it over, turn it around, for everything can be found in it."

I firmly believe that our traditional Jewish texts, liturgy and song are living organisms that hold countless levels of meaning, if one only looks at them in the right way. And so it is with the popular hymn Ma'oz Tsur, popularly and loosely translated in English as Rock of Ages.

After Jews around the world light the menorah, they traditionally sing Ma'oz Tsur. Not so fast, though.

This year, stop and ask yourself: "What is this brief text? What's Ma'oz Tsur all about?" The answer is much more interesting than you probably thought.

First, most of the six-stanza liturgical song called Ma'oz Tsur (literally, Mighty Stronghold,) has nothing to do with Chanukah. In particular, the first stanza, which is by far the most familiar, is almost completely unrelated to the holiday. The translation in the ArtScroll version reads:

O mighty stronghold of my salvation, To praise you is a delight.
Restore my House of Prayer and there we will bring a thanks-giving offering.
When You will have prepared the slaughter for the blaspheming foe,
Then I shall complete with a song of hymn
the dedication of the Altar.

For most Jews, this stanza is all they know of Ma'oz Tsur. But it's really more of a preface to the song than it is a song itself.

Structurally, this blunt invocation, calling on God to restore the Temple worship and avenge the enemies of the Jews, serves as an introduction to the next four stanzas, which are the real essence of the hymn and allude to four eras of persecution and eventual redemption of the Jewish people.

These are the period of slavery under pharaoh in Egypt (stanza 2), the destruction of the First Temple (stanza 3), Haman's failed attempt to exterminate the Jews (stanza 4), and finally, the oppression by the Hellenistic Syrians that led to the Chanukah miracle (stanza 5).

A sixth stanza of Ma'oz Tsur recapitulates and once more asks God to exact revenge on the enemies of the Jews.

So it seems that textually, Ma'oz Tsur is as relevant to Passover or to Purim as it is to Chanukah. We don't really know why the song became permanently attached to Chanukah. We do know that it originated in 13th-century Germany and was written by an otherwise unknown poet named Mordecai.

The well-known melody came later; its first known use in connection with Ma'oz Tsur is found in a 1744 manuscript, but scholars think it was borrowed from 15th-century church hymns.

As Hebrew poetry, Ma'oz Tsur is straightforward. Even in the full six-stanza form, it is relatively brief. It relies on both ordinary and internal rhyme and is mostly free of the obscure allusions that are present in much of the literature of medieval synagogue poetry.

Ma'oz Tsur includes several clear references to biblical verses; there is nothing surprising about this, as the Hebrew Bible was known to all Jews at the time and was the basis for all religious Jewish literature of the period.

'The well-known melody came later'

However, the revenge motif that is explicit in Ma'oz Tsur has troubled some segments of the Jewish community for more than a century. In fact, two well-known American Reform rabbis, Marcus Jastrow and Gustave Gottheil, composed the considerably toned-down English version Rock of Ages in the 19th century to get the blood and slaughter out of the song and to make it more palatable to what they saw as contemporary sensibilities.

In a 1997 online article in Jewish World Review – www.jewishworldreview.com – historian Lawrence Charap points out that the paradox of Ma'oz Tsur is the same as the paradox of Chanukah: A holiday whose theme was originally particularistic and even a little xenophobic has been transmuted in contemporary Christian America into a universalistic glorification of the freedom of the human spirit.

Meanwhile, those readers who have difficulties with the invocation of God's revenge – and who would still like to keep the hymn and strengthen its ties to Chanukah – have an easy and effective solution. They should restore the forgotten fifth stanza to prominence and sing it, using the traditional melody, in lieu of, or in addition to, the first. It's quite beautiful and appropriate for this season of the year:

Greeks gathered against me
Then in Hasmonean days.
They breached the walls of my towers and they defiled all the oils;
And from the one remnant of the flasks
a miracle was wrought for the roses.
Men of insight – eight days established for song and jubilation.

Chanukah is a chance to bring light into world

By SHARON HALPER
Jewish telegraphic Agency

As the rabbis asked – what is Chanukah? It's the darkest time of the year. One might easily believe that it will never be light and warm again. Natural history proves us wrong. The miracle of the seasons is the evidence.

There's darkness in many parts of the world. One could almost believe that it will never be light and warm for some people again. Jewish history proves us wrong. The miracle of caring is the evidence. We are in the light business. Zot Chanukah – this is Chanukah.

This Chanukah, plan on increasing the light in the world with special gifts – the gifts of yourselves.

Before Chanukah, play a family game of Light Up The World. Make the longest list you can of ways you can brighten up the world. It's a game that every family member can play.

The 3-year-old can turn on the lights with kisses and crayoned pictures; the teen can visit with an elderly relative or drive a lonely person to your synagogue for a class or activity.

All children can share their plenty – from warm clothes to the warmth of a gesture of friendship in an invitation to join the lunch table or the extension of a helping hand.

Hang your list in a central location, like the refrigerator, as a reminder that the world can always use some extra light. Here are a few suggestions for special gifts:

• Make certain that all adults in your family have registered with your local bone marrow registry – www.giftoflife.com. We can save lives in many ways. The most direct and dramatic is with the gift of bone marrow. Don't miss the opportunity to save a life, and make certain that your children know you are registered.

When you give blood, take your children along to watch. Celebrate yourself with a major ice-cream event on the way home!

• If your post-teen is going out into the "real world" and leaving childhood behind, make professional hair-styling into a gift of new life. Locks of Love accepts donations of unprocessed hair, 10 inches or longer. Donations are made into wigs for children who are experiencing long-term medically induced hair loss. For more information, go to www.locksoflove.com.

• Got a clown in the family? Clowning is serious business. It brings life to the ill and lonely. Find out about projects that train "mitzvah clowns" from "Sweet Pea" and "Buttercup" – aka Mike and Sue Turk – at bipamima@aol.com.

• Is there a teen on the phone in your house? Contact your local school district or senior citizen program. Find out if they run a phone contact program for children who are home alone after school or lonely senior citizens. Turn your teen-talker into a mitzvah-doer.

• Are there animal lovers in your family? Contact your local animal shelter and ask for ways your family can help. You might have some four-legged company on your family's walks. If you are ready for a major animal-related mitzvah, contact your local organization that provides seeing-eye dogs for the visually impaired and find out about raising a puppy for their use.

As you bask in the warm glow of the menorah, plan ways of bringing light into our world.

Zot Chanukah – that's Chanukah!

The contemporary poetry of Sephardi women

By RAHEL MUSLEAH

I am on my way home, driving down familiar streets, only a few blocks to go, and out of nowhere a merciless hand comes and grips my heart and wrings it dry. I tremble... I am no longer sure if I am awake or dreaming. If I die, who will find me? All I can do is pray: Let me return home, I am almost there, please...

I don't know why this happens. What I know is that, so far, my prayers have been answered. Hardly breathing, I reach my house. And when I open the door, I hear many keys clanging, the keys my ancestors stubbornly took with them to their exile.

Prayer, from Everything I Kept/Todo Lo Que Guarde, by Ruth Behar

Like the house keys her fleeing Spanish ancestors took with them, hoping to return home someday, Ruth Behar's poetry unlocks the emotions connected with exile, homecoming, loss, regret and reconciliation.

The words of her poetry, carefully chosen and chiselled, open the door to a history of double diaspora in her family: Born in Cuba in 1956, she is the product of Sephardi and Ashkenazi heritages. Her paternal Turkish grandparents fled to Cuba in the 1920s; her maternal Polish-Russian grandparents fled the impending horror of Nazism. But the Cuban Revolution in 1961 left the Jewish population feeling threatened, and a mass exodus followed. Behar grew up in Queens, N.Y., watching the family remake itself as American immigrants.

The contemporary poetry of Sephardi women like Behar often focuses on bridging borders and cultures. It tells of abuela and abuelo (grandmother and grandfather), of Tante Cluta and Uncle Victor, of Kastoria and Cordoba, of belly dancing and biscochos. Family stories and the immigrant experience take centre stage, with explorations of self and community. Often, the poems spill out after a visit back "home," whether it is to Cuba, Spain or Greece.

Some of the women have been writers all their lives but have only recently delved into poetry; some have been poets all their lives but have only recently reconnected with their Sephardi roots. Their audiences are generic, made up of people who have rediscovered the joy of listening to the spoken word. Some of their Sephardi-based poems have been published in Sephardic-American Voices, edited by Diane Matza (University Press of New England), in the feminist magazine Bridges (Vol 7, No. 1), and in various other journals.

For Moroccan-born author Ruth Knafo Setton, poetry represents an attempt to uncover identity. "Poetry encompasses all the selves in me: the Sephardi pre-memory self, the exile and the immigrant, the assimilated American, the woman in all her roles... and an ancient ageless identity that includes and transcends all these. In poetry all the voices can speak."

Raised in Allentown, Pa., she says, "When I grew up my house was like a little Morocco. The food was Moroccan. The music was French-Moroccan. I'd open the door and instead of palm trees and the sea, I'd see snow and red barns. It was so alien and strange, like two completely different worlds. We didn't live surrounded by Sephardi Jews, or any Jews, but by the Pennsylvania Dutch."

Setton condenses some of her childhood experiences in Nightfruits: "Behind the closed door, Mom dances on toes round as marbles/ to flamenco that makes her weep into mint tea./ 'We were nightfruits,' she says. 'We bloomed in the dark.'/ I searched the coiled and nubbed snow for a splash/ of music and fruit, a glint of sun and blood."

Setton is an accomplished writer, awaiting the publication this winter of her novel, The Road to Fez (Counterpoint). But it wasn't until a year ago that she began writing poetry, when a fellowship she thought she won for fiction turned out to be for poetry.

"Everyone was convinced they were going to 'convert Ruth to the truth.'" she recalls. "They took the first paragraph of a story I'd written and turned it into a poem. I realized I was channelling all my lyrical and magical impulses into my fiction. Within three days, I was writing poems. They were coming out like overripe fruits. Poetry begins with roots. For me, those are Sephardi-Mizrachi roots. If you start with the roots and grow, then it touches everyone, because you've started somewhere deep and true."

Though Ruth Behar wrote poetry as a teenager, she turned to anthropology to work out the "diasporic puzzles" of her identity.

Anthropology "gave me the philosophic framework to understand how people relate to culture," explains the University of Michigan professor.

It wasn't until a visit to Cuba in 1991 that she realized she couldn't treat the place she was born as just another field site.

Her first poem was inspired by the Jewish cemetery in Guanabacoa, actually an Ashkenazi cemetery where her mother's cousin is buried. He had died at 12 in the mid-1950s, and was thus left behind when family departed in 1961.

"In the poem, I'm speaking to the cousin when I go back to visit his grave in order to take a picture of it. But the camera gets stuck and I realize I've come back too late."

Behar writes all her poems in English and then produces Spanish versions because her native language comes from a "deeper historical root" inside her. She is currently working on a film about the Jews of Cuba, Adios Querida (Goodbye, My Love). She has written about 100 poems, many with Jewish themes. Though they are not always specifically Sephardi, they often have a "Sephardi valence," she says.

For instance, she characterizes her inability to forgive as a trait with Sephardi roots. "In my family," she says, "it's very hard for people to reconcile. We were given the edict: Convert or die! That dictum left a legacy of intolerance."

She expresses the struggle with the lack of forgiveness in Nameless Daughter, a poem for Papi, her father:

"I'm not a Sephardi poet," says Brenda Serotte, who grew up in a Turkish family in the Bronx. "I'm a poet who writes about Sephardi things. We all have a touch of that Spanish tradition, that longing that comes from pouring your heart out in secret."

Rosaly DeMaios Roffman, whose ancestry is Greek, agrees: "You can classify Jewish poets, Irish poets, women poets, New York poets, New Age poets, gray-haired poets. These are territories and people can be claimed. If you write out of what's closest to you, you touch on many things."

Both Serotte and Roffman began valuing their Sephardi roots late into their writing careers. To fulfil an assignment that required translating a poem from another language, Serotte's mentor suggested the Ladino she knew fluently.

"Something happened when I started to speak the language and translate it again," Serotte says. "I began to think about my past and my family in ways I never did before."

Growing up in an Ashkenazi neighbourhood, Serotte used to be embarrassed by her Sephardi heritage. "While other kids' fathers listened to radio baseball, on a Sunday afternoon my family was doing belly dancing and holding Turkish parties. Other grandmothers made latkes and chicken soup and knitted. My mother remembers that when she came home from school, her mother and friends were sewing their shrouds. I wanted to forget all that."

Now she misses that warm, boisterous family and draws on her rich memories for a poetry collection, Dance Into Your Sultan's Heart, and a memoir, Turkish Delights and Other Fattening Recollections. Translating Ladino poetry has become a passion.

In The Scholar's Turban, Serotte recalls being immobilized with polio at the age of seven, unable to entertain in her blue chiffon belly-dancing costume. A girl's job was to be pretty, a good dancer, a good cook and marry well, says Serotte, who recovered and notes: "No wonder I became a feminist!

"Ringed around my bed were the staring eyes of Father, Aunt Sultana, and Aunt Alegra. Mother sucked Chesterfields at the kitchen table, each drag like the hiss of a distant steam iron. Then in marched Uncle Ovadiah wearing the kavuk, the 'scholar's turban,' a huge, lavender silk wraparound with a 'diamond' clip in its centre. The kavuk was for playing Wizard at family parties.

"Like a wise effendi, Uncle Ovadiah formed a pyramid with his fingers, bent his turbaned head, then commanded me: 'Get up and dance! Dance into your sultan's heart!'

"I locked eyes with my Sultan. Unblinking, mine turned watery. Father's eyes squinted, begged. His face became dark red, like when he got mad. The command came a second time: 'Dance now! Dance into your sultan's heart!' "

For Roffman, who always considered herself more Greek and Spanish than Jewish, the 500th anniversary of the expulsion from Spain reawakened her Sephardi consciousness. She discovered people were still writing in Ladino, and later received a Witter Bynner foundation award to collect and create equivalencies for the small lode of 20th century poems written in Ladino.

Roffman wrote her first poem at seven, her first published poem at 14. The editor of Aristeia, a myth journal, she writes about "myth in contemporary dress" and about healing. She stresses that Sephardi themes are just one of many that animate her poetry.

"Poetry is a search for a kind of language, not an explaining, straightforward language," she says. "For me, it's a way of reversing the pain of the real world."

Several of her poems were inspired by a trip to Greece, where she felt she was "stepping on ground my ancestors may have stepped on."

Sephardim invisible in immigrant tales to Kastoria, where she felt "the old lives animated the flowers."

The light is still here, grandfather in the stones of Kastoria, of Yanninna

A man from these black and green hills drove us for a fee through mountains

He could have been Uncle Victor or Maurice and he listens well to the singing of the trees –

A cross on the front mirror strikes his cheek every time he pitches forward in this old cab –

But grandfather, he is stubborn like you – he says he knows enough good men and women who would still hide us in the stone hills, and whose bones would push up these Greek roses

"The immigrant tale has been told and retold in 'mainstream' American Jewish literature," says Judy Benoliel Belsky, a poet and psychologist who grew up in Seattle and now lives in Jerusalem.

"In this literature Sephardim are not even marginalized. They are invisible. The Torah observant are constantly trivialized. Women are marginalized or eviscerated. I am all three! Woman, Sephardi, Torah observant. My poems rub against the friction of old lies."

In After Dark, these three selves emerge strongly:

Layers of identity press against each other like nested peasant dolls
the walls are thin voices call in another mother tongue
hijica ven aqui

my aunts are on vacation no one enters the cottage until they scour and kosher the kitchen prepare the turkish coffee and fresh biscochos

they dedicate a tiny temple beside another ocean shore

the sacred is portable

Schulamith Halevy, an Israeli poet and scholar, also combines feminist, religious and Sephardi themes in her poetry. Born in Switzerland to an Israeli father, her family's tradition is that they are descended from the great Spanish poet Yehudah Halevy. She became involved with the anusim – the Hebrew word for forced converts – when she was invited to speak at a conference on conversos in 1992.

"My bonding with the anusim was instantaneous," she says. She has now become a resource for the community.

"The anusim are a matricentric culture," she says, almost entirely led by women.

One major figure for Halevy is Santa Theresa de Avila, a patron saint of Spain said to be of Jewish descent. Halevy writes both in Hebrew and English, although many of the poems about anusim are in English. She has also translated four poems written by anusim.

How you shudder on my skin.

What scenes from our past remain sealed in you, what roots still not starved?
Pine trees and sunflower patches and olive groves embrace me now
– the meadows of your life
Yellow hill – pure skies.

Writing the best of both worlds: gefilte fish, kibbeh

What visions of Jerusalem
– the skirts of Galilee flow through your blood?
What voices came from the hereafter to distill your tears?
–From Santa Teresa

While she writes about love, life, loss, Jerusalem and God, much of Halevy's poetry centres around the experience of the anusim, whose "spiritual rape," she says, "is not only incredibly painful but is also a metaphor for the human condition that almost always involves some loss of sovereignty. The Sephardi side of my life is connected to my calling in this world."

For Linda Ashear, the poetic impulse to express things Sephardi is more subtle. "I write to express a feeling," says Ashear, born in Brooklyn to a Syrian-Austrian family. Many of her Sephardi poems relate to her father, who came from Aleppo to New York as a toddler. Ashear wrote a series of 23 poems about him, spanning the period from her childhood to the third summer after he passed away.

Ashear says she tries to take the best of the Ashkenazi and Sephardi worlds, "both gefilte fish and kibbeh." Though she now lives in Westchester, she still has "strong links" to the Brooklyn Syrian community. But she does not write a lot about it.

"I can't force it out though I have tremendous feelings about it," she says. "I don't want to present a negative image. I haven't yet figured out how to write a balanced and truthful poem."

In Revelation, she writes of being "the sum of all my parts:"

'Holocaust not just an Ashkenazi province'

I am union organizer, Marxist pig, breaker of stone tablets, harlot people spit at in the street, bubbaleh, mommaleh, Sheina Medaleh, baptized in blood of my fathers, mothers, sons, daughters…

I shed my past like willow leaves.
Each Autumn I turn yellow like the sun
& spring to life each May to weep green tears that soak the earth, warm soil where my roots lay buried.

Anger, hope, life, love and death mix in the poetry of Miriam Israel Moses, the daughter of Holocaust survivors from Greece. "The Holocaust is not just an Ashkenazi province," says Moses. "I've been walking around with that one great banner all my life."

Moses uses poetic prose to write about the Holocaust: "I want people to feel a fluidity of death and dying and horror," she says. "I want it to hurt. Poetic prose streams, and you feel you're living a present-tense experience."

In her memoir, Survivors and Pieces of Glass, she describes the day she imagines when the German soldiers came:

"I can see then my mother, sitting in her shop where they called her the woman with 'manos do oro.' Her adept fingers placed finishing touches on the beautiful dress she was making for her younger sister with the sun golden hair that I have never seen and whose name I never knew, who was my aunt before I was born and I cannot go on. The horror is only as bad as the beauty that was described to me in the lost looks of my mother's eyes so many years later when she told me only small parts of the story and I filled in the rest because I do not know if she was at the shop and I do not know if she was finishing a dress for her golden sister who was like a wisp of cloud in sunny sky on that day and every other day. But I know my mother's hands and I know the way she sang while she sewed and I know how she broke thread in her mouth without once losing a note of her melodies of sailors lost on the sea and golden sisters waiting for love."

A singer and composer of choral works and musicals, Moses decided in her 40s "to make poetry a serious part of my life, on a par with music in terms of craftsmanship and effect. Music and poetry are accessible to different people, and I wanted to widen my audience."

She lives in Seattle, but despite the community's large Sephardi population, she still feels very separate, which heightens her need to "communicate Jewish and Sephardi things about myself."

Though she writes about her cats in her poetry, about the Internet, math and physics, her underlying perceptions come from her Sephardi heritage.

"Being Sephardi," she says, "is everything that I am."

Rahel Musleah is an author who also presents programs on the Jewish communities of India, where she was born.

Medical relief mission to native Ethiopia

By SIMON GRIVER
WZPS

"The filth and the disease were very depressing," said Afrat Yalew, a 27-year-old Israeli nurse who returned to her native Ethiopia for the first time last spring.

"I could not look the patients in the eye because I felt so sad for them. We saw a lot of malaria and tuberculosis," Yalew said.

Yalew was a member of the second medical delegation sent to Ethiopia by the Jewish Agency last June. The Jewish Agency, in co-operation with Jewish Health Care International and Israel's ministry of foreign affairs, initiated the emergency humanitarian assistance operation at the end of May to offer aid to the victims of the latest Ethiopian famine.

Emergency humanitarian assistance

"In recent years, the Jewish Agency has initiated a number of humanitarian operations worldwide on behalf of the Jewish people," said Meir Nitzan, director general of the Jewish Agency, whose office co-ordinated the program.

"For example, last year we sent aid to the Kosovo refugees in Albania."

The series of missions was named Operation Abie, in the spirit of Abie Nathan, one of Israel's pioneers in promoting humanitarian assistance to the needy worldwide. The first mission of two doctors and two nurses left Israel in late May and spent three weeks in Woldie in the Wollo province in northeast Ethiopia.

The added value of the Israeli delegation was that three of the four members were born in Ethiopia and were able to speak Amharic directly with the people they were treating.

Haunting memories return for Israeli nurses

Moreover, the Ethiopian-born members of the Israeli delegations have all had their own lives touched by illness. Tali Adga, a 27-year-old nurse from the emergency and accidents department at Assaf Harofe Hospital and a member of the first delegation to Wollo, almost died en route to Israel in 1984.

"I don't remember a single thing from our nine-month trek across Sudan back in 1984," said Adga, who was then 11 years old.

"I had a fever and my family carried me most of the way. Despite the lack of basic medical facilities in Africa, my parents tell me that the right treatment in several hospitals saved my life. Because of the experience, I always wanted to become a medical professional."

Adga found her three weeks back in Ethiopia very frustrating.

"In the short time that we were there, we were only able to scratch the surface. We treated malaria, tuberculosis, dysentery and so many diseases that can be routinely treated in Israel," Adga said.

"We were overwhelmed. I feel strongly that I must go back for a longer period. They need so much help."

Yalew's immigration to Israel was even more harrowing. She, too, came down with fever en route to Israel from Ethiopia in 1984. Her parents left her in a local hospital for treatment and went on ahead, expecting to be reunited with her in a few days.

But the border between Ethiopia and Sudan, which her parents had crossed, was closed and she was returned to her grandparents. It was not until 1990 that she saw her parents again, when she reached Israel.

'They need so much help'

Today, Yalew is head nurse in the intensive care unit of the internal medicine department at Sheba Medical Centre in Tel Aviv.

"What made me want to become a medical professional was watching my grandfather die because there was not the medical know-how to save him," Yalew said.

"There was not even equipment to diagnose what was wrong with him."

Yalew, whose Ethiopian name means consolation, was born several years after her older brother died of disease at the age of 18 months.

"I don't know exactly what he had, but I'm sure it could have been easily treated by modern medicine," she said.

Returning to Ethiopia reminded Yalew of the hopelessly unfulfilled medical needs of her native country. She did not enjoy getting up in the morning during her recent stay because she recalled that every day there were 500 sick people crowded around their clinic in the Wollo region.

"We would work around the clock to treat them all, and then the next morning there would be even more people there," Yalew said.

"So many times we saw children who seemed to be dying. They were just dehydrated from diarrhea or dysentery. We had them on a drip infusion and within a few hours they were fine.

"Their parents thought we were angels who had come from the Holy Land to perform miracles. Indeed, without us their children might have died."

In July, two additional delegations were dispatched to Ethiopia, including American doctors and nurses as well as Israeli medical personnel born in Ethiopia.

"For the time being we will carry on sending the delegations," said program coordinator Nili Bergman of the Jewish Agency's director general's office.

"At any one time, there will always be a mission of at least two Jewish doctors and two Jewish nurses in Wollo."

In addition to ongoing medical assistance, Operation Abie will seek to provide medicine and medical equipment to the regional hospital in Woldie. Establishing a training program for primary health care personnel in Wollo province will also offer long-term help.

The four delegations who have been to Ethiopia so far are just the beginning of a major campaign on behalf of the Jewish people to assist the local health services in this famine-ridden province.

Opinion

A plea from Jerusalem

By AMANDA WEISS
Special to The CJN

Basic misconceptions and misinformation have been constantly pounded into the public media information network about the conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians for the past 10 weeks. It is time to make some clear and definitive statements to correct these wrongs.

Israel is a powerful force, but is located on a tiny strip of land. One merely needs to look at a map to truly understand just how thin this strip of land is. Since its independence in 1948, the country has endured a constant and steady barrage of attacks from its neighbours, escalating into wars.

Daily news reports and Palestinians Saeb Erekat, Hanan Ashrawi, Yasser Arafat and their interviewers claim that the brutal force of Israel has been unleashed upon their innocent children and youth. But the Arab tactics are known. On the front lines are children throwing stones at Israeli soldiers and civilians, and only behind the children are the adult males, many now armed with the weapons made available since the "peace process" and Oslo accords began.

How can a comparison be made between the injuries and deaths of children sitting on a schoolbus who are deliberately targeted and children who stand in front of armed and masked militia men in the heart of confrontation?

Since the 1993 handshake between Yitzak Rabin and Yasser Arafat, Israel has made more concessions, compromises and efforts to build a true peace than its Arab neighbours. Israel has standing peace agreements with two of its most important neighbours, Egypt and Jordan. Israel has pulled its troops out of Lebanon, re-exposing its northern border civilians and soldiers once again to being on the front lines. Efforts have also been made to reach a peace agreement with one of Israel's most antagonistic neighbours, Syria.

Following Yitzhak Rabin's legacy, Prime Minister Ehud Barak has put the heart and soul of the Jewish nation on the bargaining table, including the fate of Jerusalem. Though this was a cost most Jews around the world and Israelis in particular could not imagine paying, Barak continued to negotiate, despite the fall of his government, in the hope that a real partner for peace was standing on the other side.

We, the Israeli people, are desperate to solve this situation with a true and lasting peace. But we may be too desperate. After all, Arafat does not want peace. He openly states it. He has proven it repeatedly. Even the staunchest proponents of peace at all costs are realizing that we are negotiating with a sinister and dangerous "partner."

Yet Arafat knows that Israel has the military might to wipe out the Palestinian infrastructure. Israel has the power to

'What are Palestinians doing to foster peace?'

unleash a violent storm on the Palestinian people to create "quiet." It would be a simple order to fill, to exact retribution brutally. Israel's army is poised and ready.

Nevertheless, the Israeli military has acted with restraint. The minimal acts of retaliation by the army to date were preceded by warnings with enough time for the civilians to clear the area.

In contrast, the terrorist forces of the Palestinian Authority and all of its splinter factions have timed their attacks to hit as many Israeli civilians as possible. They adamantly declare their jihad, their holy war, and their goal to murder and maim every Israeli.

Though there is not a family in Israel that is not connected to the military through sons, fathers, brothers, colleagues, neighbours or friends, Israelis are not murderers, and they are not bent on the destruction of the Palestinian Arab people.

The opposite is true. Israel has never been riper for peace. Thousands of Israeli citizens – from children at the kindergarten level to adults from every corner of society – have initiated and participated in coexistence programming throughout the State. These programs are the product of daily grassroots work initiated by Israeli Jews, and often supported by contributions and grants from the Diaspora. The Ministry of Education's school curriculum teaches the importance of respect and coexistence. Foundations such as the Abraham Fund exist with the sole purpose of fostering coexistence between Israeli Jews and Arabs through educational programming, and they alone support hundreds of projects each year.

What are Palestinian Arabs doing to foster peace? What are their children learning? The Tanzim, Arafat's elite militia force, have been running summer training camps for thousands of Arab youth each summer – camps where their children "play" at kidnapping and assassinating Israelis. Pride is instilled in them at their mother's breast – a pride that openly declares each child's importance in fighting the Zionist enemy and, as Yasser Arafat has been quoted many times, in helping push the Zionist enemy into the sea.

Each Arab who dies during this intifadah – each child whose life is cut short so brutally – brings honour to the family, not to mention financial rewards. In Palestinians' burial processions, the deceased is carried above the heads of the crowd wrapped in a kaffigeh and draped in a Palestinian flag, but the face is exposed. This is the burial of a martyr.

The media, unfortunately, is another battleground in this war. Recently, the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo was claimed to be a Jewish settlement inside the Arab town of Beit Jala. I live next door to Gilo. I hear the attacks on Gilo most nights. I have friends and colleagues who live there. It is very much a Jerusalem neighbourhood.

And where is the Christian world? How can Christians in good conscience sit and watch while the Christian Arabs of Beit Jala are manipulated and victimized by the Tanzim? The same tactics were used during the fighting in Lebanon: the Hezbollah would shoot from a hospital or kindergarten and retaliation would horrify the world. How can Israel possibly counter a news report that starts with "Israel bombs a children's playground"?

We are sickened by the unholy manipulation of children in this intifadah, and by the fathers and mothers who allow this atrocious victimization of their babies.

In the past few weeks, Arafat's Fatah movement was responsible for two attacks on schoolbuses. Car bombs have been detonated in civilian areas next to public buses in rush hour, or as near as possible to crowded public markets.

Arafat blames Israel for the attacks. The media legitimizes his claim by reporting it as fact. But who targets schoolbuses? Who targets shoppers and innocent bystanders? We have reached a level of topsy-turvy moral inversion where truth and honesty no longer have a place in the media.

God help us all.

Amanda Weiss is the public relations and education director of the Bible Lands Museum in Jerusalem. She has initiated coexistence education programs within the museum for the past three years.

Happy Chanukah

Nazi-era memory

By MICHAEL GORDON

On the patient's left forearm, the pale blue Auschwitz number could still be seen. She would not agree to the pacemaker even though she had collapsed four times and her symptomatic sick-sinus syndrome was so easily treated.

She had survived vivisection experiments during her concentration camp internment, and she refused any surgery.

We appealed to her son. Although he agreed with the need for treatment, he did not want to go against his mother's wishes.

"I survived the Holocaust, I will survive this," she said when asked why she would decline such a simple, safe and life-saving treatment. Some members of the health-care team felt strongly that we should heed her wishes; others felt that we must treat her.

Isn't it time to forget about the Holocaust? It was so many years ago. Is there anyone left to whom it really matters?

It is common to hear people make such comments. There have been recent special reparation payments agreed to by German companies that were involved in Nazi-period slave labour. Are the payments meaningful or symbolic and does it matter anymore to those who live with the memories of slave labour, mass murder and concentration camps?

All who survived the Holocaust were deeply scarred by it. All carry the profound trauma with them but have coped over the years in different ways. Some have never managed to escape the impact it made on their lives, and their experience colours everything they do. In their later years, the horror of their experience may begin to be incorporated into their daily travails.

Some years ago, I was hospitalized in Toronto with a back condition. While waiting on a stretcher to be taken by the orderly to the therapeutic pool, I heard a patient in the next room screaming, "No, no!" The orderly asked him why he was shouting so much as he was just going to take him for a shower. Every time the orderly repeated this phrase, the patient screamed out more frantically, "No, no!" The panic was palpable.

I heard this on two occasions and could detect the patient's eastern European Yiddish accent. I suddenly realized that the patient was responding to the word "shower" in a way that reminded him of the past. He may have believed the "shower" offered by the orderly was the same as the one in the camps, where it was used as a euphemism for the exterminating gas chambers.

I told the nurse and she informed the orderly, and the word "bath" or "wash" was substituted for "shower." The screaming stopped.

With cognitive decline, the success of memory suppression, which may have worked as a coping mechanism, begins to fail. One Polish-born patient with Alzheimer's disease was getting along fine with full-time help at home until the helper with whom she spoke English became ill. The family found a replacement, a lovely lady whose mother tongue was Polish, which they thought would be perfect, as in the past their mother had spoken Polish when necessary. She even once had a Polish-speaking housekeeper.

Suddenly their mother began screaming and threatening to kill herself and wouldn't let the woman in the house. She told them: "Why should I speak Polish after all they did to me?" The children were baffled. They could not understand that the loss of the ability to deal with the present made the past feel immediate. The suppressed associations with the brutality she experienced in Poland became real when she heard Polish being spoken.

Some patients draw on the strengths that helped them in the past, in order to cope with their medical problems today. Years ago, I looked after a patient who survived in the woods of Czechoslovakia for almost four years during the Holocaust years. He once told me how he lived in caves and ate what he could find, including insects, berries and small animals. He frequently hid in dangerous and precarious places when he heard soldiers on the lookout for fugitives. Occasionally he could hear someone being caught, and often beaten or summarily shot. When liberated, he immigrated to Canada after he discovered the community he had come from no longer existed. The only surviving family member was his young daughter who had been kept in hiding by some non-Jewish neighbours and whom he found after the war. They came to Canada, where he became a successful businessman.

Implications for medical treatment

He came to live in Baycrest Terrace, the residence at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in Toronto. He had angina which became more symptomatic. He benefited from each new treatment that became available, such as calcium channel blockers. He was a model patient, using nitrates before activities and undertaking all his efforts in a carefully determined manner. Finally he reached the point where he was not controlled on maximal anti-anginal therapy and had angina at rest. Angiography revealed four-vessel disease. The cardiologist's letter to me, which said he was not suitable for surgery, estimated that he had about a 25 percent chance of dying from the surgery.

I read the letter to the patient. He looked straight into my eyes and said, "Does a 25 percent chance of dying from the surgery mean I have a 75 percent chance of surviving the surgery?"

I nodded.

"Those are great odds," he said. "I hid in the woods of Czechoslovakia for four years, and every day I had a 99 percent chance of dying; so I'll take those odds."

I told him I would make another appointment for him to see the surgeon and that I would write a letter. I told him to dress the way he usually did, in a suit and tie, and tell her what he just told me. Two and a half weeks after his bypass and pacemaker insertion for post-operative heart block, he was back in the Terrace, without anginal symptoms.

Another recent experience confirmed for me that actions of survivors cannot be readily predicted. I began to see a man some years ago because his family thought he was acting in a peculiar manner. He and his wife were both survivors but hardly mentioned their suffering. Suddenly the father began to focus on his concentration camp experiences and started writing poems and stories in Yiddish, Polish and English and talking to everyone about what he had been through. His family was distraught and assumed he had "flipped."

During my interview with him, it was evident he was cognitively intact, with no psychotic features. He had come to believe that in the few years left of his life, the "world should know" that it was real and that no one should be allowed to deny it. This quest to tell became an obsession for him but was giving energy and new meaning to his life.

With his permission, I explained to his children what I thought was going on and that they had to find a way to support his efforts. I explained to him that he had to respect their need to find ways to cope with this new aspect of his life. At every visit to my teaching clinic he brought in new stories and poems and finally his self-published autobiography. The postgraduate trainees in my clinic, most of whom were not Jewish, were mesmerized by him and told me they had never had a comparable clinical experience.

He had severe and incapacitating pain during walking, which was diagnosed as spinal stenosis. When surgery was first suggested, his children characteristically expressed their opposition to it, in a way clearly reflecting their desire to "protect" him. Eventually the pain was unbearable and unrelieved by all medical interventions. He requested surgery.

He had an appointment with me about three weeks after the surgery. I happened to be in the corridor when he arrived, accompanied by his son, walking briskly, upright and without a cane. I could not believe it. He told me that he had his surgery on the day before Passover. The day after surgery, he said he wanted to go home and it seemed that no one objected to the request. He said he was taking only acetaminophen once in awhile for pain. As I spoke to him and commended him on his wonderful recovery, he looked at me with a half-smile: "You know, doctor," he said, "surviving a concentration camp is good training for any surgery." I could not find an answer.

Most clinicians have some patients with remarkable histories of trauma and courage from different eras and many parts of the world. For those who survived the Holocaust, there is a special meaning to their lives because so many lost most or all of their friends and families and are now aging. Illness and death often have a special and sometimes strongly symbolic meaning for this population and for their families: "After what they survived – this?"

The first patient described above was evaluated psychiatrically and felt to be incapable of making an informed decision about the pacemaker because of her fixation on her Holocaust experience. Her son agreed to the pacemaker. She was scheduled for it to be inserted, but had a fatal cardiac arrest before it could be done. One could say her Holocaust experience proved fatal to her, 50 years after the fact.

Searching for a memory...

By DEBBIE VADAS-LEVISON
Special to The CJN

The absence of extended family in my life has been a gaping wound, like the stump left behind by the amputated branches of my family tree. Ancestral tales have been silenced. There were no pockets full of candy to rummage through or gentle gnarled grandfather hands to hold. No aged voices intoned the Kiddush on erev Shabbat.

The anecdotes of my father's childhood were lost, and only one sweetly wrinkled face beamed at recitals. Missing also were the boisterous gatherings of aunts, uncles and cousins, for our entire clan consisted of a mere five people – mother, father, maternal grandmother, brother and me.

And for my father, losing his loved ones in the Holocaust has meant decades of excruciating uncertainty and agonized questions about their fate. He, like most survivors, found no comfort in closure – that is, until recent events led him to discover some long-awaited truths.

My father was born in the Hungarian town of Balassagyarmat, about 50 miles north of Budapest. On March 19, 1944, the Germans occupied Hungary, and the fearsome climate of anti-Semitism worsened – the Jewish communities in the town and in neighbouring villages were rounded up and ghettoized. Existing anti-Jewish laws were toughened: travelling on the streets was restricted to one hour a day, personal possessions (radios, jewelry, even children's bicycles, including my father's) were handed over to authorities, and Jews were banned from public places and transportation.

In the middle of June, deportations began. Hungarian collaborators vied to outdo their colleagues in cruelty. While Germans were content to shove 70 people into each boxcar, Hungarians succeeded in cramming fully 90 people into unimaginably grotesque conditions. And in infinite irony, the Hungarians made the Jews pay for the very padlocks that would fasten the boxcar doors.

At the age of 17, my father was among the youngest of hundreds of boys who were sent into forced labour (in later weeks the age limit would be lowered to include 15- and 16-year-olds). As the Russians approached towards the end of November, the Hungarian Command handed the boys over to German forces, and they were sent by train to the Austrio-German border to dig anti-tank trenches. Days elapsed upon their arrival before their boxcar doors were even opened.

Subsequently, my father was sent to Mauthausen where he remained until the Allies liberated the camp on May 5, 1945. He eventually returned to Hungary to find that his parents, sister and other relatives were gone. He was never able to find out what had happened to them.

My brother Peter, who had long been engrossed in archival records and had attempted to piece together our fragmented family history, heard that the Red Cross Society had access to an international tracing service for information on victims of the Holocaust. In 1992, he initiated a search on our father's behalf. Years passed and at last, in 1998, the Canadian Red Cross forwarded a reply – and the findings were astonishing.

It appeared that my grandmother Ilona and my aunt Elli had perished in Auschwitz, and there was thus, sadly, no more information to be had. But my grandfather Heinrich, who on June 12, 1944, had also been interned in Auschwitz, had been transferred to Buchenwald on June 24. Two days later, he was chosen as a Haftling, a strong Hungarian-Jewish worker, and sent to a factory in Bochum, Germany, to manufacture munitions and grenades. The prisoners there suffered intolerably brutal conditions, and at 8 a.m. on Dec. 27, 1944, my once-strapping grandfather died of "cardiac and circulatory insufficiency with general physical weakness."

But there was a twist of fate that would set my grandfather and a scant few dozen others like him apart from most of the six million.

In November 1944, the Bochum Crematorium was bombed and was henceforth out of service. While countless other victims of the Shoah were piled in mass graves, it was the personal decision of an unusually decent cemetery superintendent to give each deceased Bochumer-Verein factory worker an individual, marked grave in the Wiemelhausen Jewish cemetery.

That is where the Red Cross found my grandfather, and that is where, after 55 years of wondering, my father found him. More than half a century after his father's death, my father knelt before the headstone, placed some stones of remembrance there, and said Kaddish at last.

For my father to find, after so long, an actual headstone with his father's name carved into it meant there was somewhere he could finally mourn; it meant a yahrzeit to commemorate.

He contacted the mayor of Bochum, Germany, and travelled there in May 1999 with my brother. They spoke to a local historian to try to get a better sense of my grandfather's days in Germany. Together they visited the Wiemelhausen cemetery. They noted that the plots and grounds were well maintained. They photographed and videotaped the area and left rocks on the headstone in the Jewish tradition. During this process, my father ...and finding a miracle

said little, and it was not until months later that he was able to communicate just how wrenching the experience had been.

A few weeks after he and my brother returned to Toronto, my father received a letter from a Mr. John Csillag of West Yorkshire in the United Kingdom.

Csillag wrote: "Both your father and mine are buried in the Wiemelhausen Jewish cemetery. Having been deported in June 1944 to Auschwitz, I was transported from there with my father and 270 others in August '44 to Bochumer Verein KZ Aussenlager on the Brullstrasse. After few months slave labour, my father died in the camp just a fortnight before the death of Heinrik Weisz. Though I obviously knew of my father's death, it was only in the late 1950s that I found out where he was buried. I believe I am the only survivor of the Brullstrasse camp."

Imagine, this Csillag might very well have known my grandfather as they worked together in the factory!

Csillag went on to say that the local historian had given him my father's address. He enclosed some further information in his letter, translated from German factory documents:

• A work unit with 50 inmates was established in Bochum, the principal task of which was to dismantle and remove unexploded bombs in the Bochum area originating from Allied air attacks since 1942. The disarming of the bombs was carried out by primitive methods and without any safety considerations. Many were killed.

• A group of workers was to build barracks and erect a high-voltage electrified security fence to contain the prisoners.

• On July 26, 1944, 434 Hungarians were transferred from Auschwitz and in August, 400 more followed. The Jews were brutally mishandled by their SS guards. Those who were no longer able to perform their work were transferred to Buchenwald for liquidation.

• One hundred and eight slaves were executed by the Nazis for illegally obtaining foodstuffs or for other offences against the harsh Nazi regime.

• One inmate's testimony reads as follows: "On the first day we received no food at all. From then on, our daily ration was: breakfast, black water (coffee), midday, beet or cabbage soup, one slice of bread and occasionally a quarter of a slice of some sausage or 10 grams of margarine. But very often we failed to receive the bread or sausage. The midday meal was our last of the day. Work commenced at 5 or 6 a.m. After breakfast was roll call, which, depending on the mood of the SS guards, took from half an hour to three hours, irrespective of weather or season. Our only clothing was underpants, shirt and the striped cotton prison garb."

• The strongest prisoners were picked to work in the factory and were exposed to the whims of their supervisors. The heaviest work was at the enormous presses, where large white-hot ingots were processed. The heat was so great that no civilian would stand nearby. Haftlings were used for this work with no protective clothing, not even gloves. I saw a Haftling working on the presses being maltreated by his foreman for using some protective cloth he had somehow acquired. Without that cloth, no doubt his hands would have been terribly burned and blistered. The management of the factory tolerated or even ordered such treatment of the workers.

Csillag recalls: "Another boy, Hans, and I were, at 16, amongst the dozen youngest Haftlings in the factory. We became friends and relied on each other to keep going. For awhile, Hans worked as crane operator above the hot stamp presses, a ghastly task in the oppressive heat of the press. One day in October 1944, Hans colluded with me in an activity that may well have saved my life. Haftlings who suffered minor work injuries were taken to the camp infirmary to recuperate. By gently lowering the crane onto my foot, Hans broke two of my toes. The two weeks in the infirmary without having to do the heavy factory work may well have helped my ultimate survival. Hans died on Jan. 10, 1945."

"It is extremely, extremely rare to find a marked Jewish grave from the Holocaust," says Linda Klein, the Red Cross director of the Holocaust and War Victim Tracing Information Centre. "We have processed over 25,000 requests for information, and have found the dates of death for over 2,000 people. In all, there were nearly no marked graves except in the case of Russian military – certainly not for Jews."

The International Red Cross's tracing office was established in 1990 specifically for World War II tracing, and its success rate runs at 35 to 50 percent. But in some cases, the results are miraculous.

"I have personally witnessed several reunions of survivors," says Klein. "It is overwhelming. For example, two sisters once asked us to trace the fate of their younger brother. They had seen the Nazis drag him away, barefoot, when he was six years old. We located him! I was at Dulles Airport with the sisters when he stepped off the plane. Even though he was now an older man, they began to cry as they recognized him right away."

According to Klein, nearly 1,000 survivors have been reunited to date. In other cases personal effects have been retrieved – the Belgian Red Cross recently sent an old, obviously authentic brown paper packet to a woman in Miami. It contained the actual food ration slips from a concentration camp, an ID card, and detailed information on the fate of her lost relative.

The process of tracing can become quite complicated, Klein says. "First we check through our computer files to see if the case is cross-referenced. Every case is entered into the databank and analyzed. We also check the survivors' registry at the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C. If the person is unknown, our team of volunteers translates the application into German, then sends it to the Tracing Centre in Arolsen, Germany, the largest repository of Nazi documentation."

There are archives in other countries, as well, and many inquiries are submitted to Ukraine, Russia, England and other countries. Any new information is communicated to the applicant.

There is always the chance that information will be discovered as more Holocaust documentation is found and made public.

"The time it takes to do a trace can vary from a few months to one or two years," says Klein, "depending on the amount of known information and the number of volunteers going through the files. There are over 47 million documents available in the International Tracing Service."

Created in 1946, the archive is funded by the German government as part of its reparations. The documents are housed in several buildings.

"Archives are springing up everywhere as part of the global push to remember, to educate and to document the Holocaust. When the Auschwitz Death Books were finally released to the world by Moscow in 1989, a host of inquiries was spurred and our centre was established the following year in response to the new demands," says Klein, who has been involved in the centre since its inception. "But since I have been here, I have not seen any traces result in locating an actual grave."

Besherte ... destiny

By BEVERLEY ABRAMSON
Special to The CJN

I was very excited about my long anticipated family picnic and photographing an ever-growing group.

The previous picnic was more than a decade earlier, when the family was smaller and long before I became a professional photographer.

To date, the largest family that I photographed was 13 children and their parents. However, now I was preparing to capture over 160 descendants of my great-great-grandfather. I never knew that I had so many living relatives and I was about to meet most of them.

How did this come about? I believe it was bashert – destiny!

On my most recent trip to Israel to visit my cousins and photograph the country, I suddenly discovered a new relative. While sitting with this family and sharing stories, I happened to answer their telephone. This alone was unusual since I'm not fluent in Hebrew and I wasn't expecting a call!

Assuming that I was the homeowner, the caller quickly introduced herself as Carolynne, a relative from Toronto, who was visiting her brother in Jerusalem. She was investigating her roots and was phoning to discover more about her Israeli family. Taken aback, I replied that I was also a visitor from Toronto and perhaps related.

Mary and Sam Katz

Excitedly we discussed our mutual relatives and relationships, and while exchanging phone numbers, made plans to meet. When I finally met Carolynne back in Toronto, she greeted me with a pile of papers and photographs.

I was surprised and overwhelmed with the information that she had gathered. She meant business and sure enough presented me with a formal genealogical study – our "family tree" dating back seven generations.

Now, how were we going to share all this with the rest of the clan of Nuta and Fayga Grynszpan?

It was bashert that our family reunion would evolve from this unexpected phone call. There were over 80 families to invite and before I knew it, my journalist cousin, Teddy, resurrected the family picnic.

He quickly rallied the elders to cover some of the costs, formed a committee of cousins, set a date and selected a park in Oakville, located halfway between Toronto and Hamilton, where most of our family resides.

E-mail addresses were obtained and a Web-site was created to maintain communication. Teddy planned to surprise everyone at the picnic with a copy of our family tree and approached me to photograph the group.

The day finally arrived! While pulling into the parking lot with my children and grandchildren, I saw the welcome sign and my mother greeting everybody. To my astonishment, I couldn't stop the tears from streaming down my face.

I realized that I was both excited and overjoyed at the prospect of meeting and exchanging stories with so many members of my family, while at the same time sad about those relatives who would not be at the picnic this time.

My father, who passed away in May 1999, and his parents were three of those significant missing people.

A close inspection of the family tree revealed that half of the people attending were the offspring of my grandparents. The other half were family members of my grandfather's siblings, whom he had sponsored to emigrate from Poland prior to and after WWII.

I couldn't help but reminisce, uncover some of the family mysteries and wonder about my heritage.

BAD BOY
NOBODY'S BETTER...NOOOBODY!

My grandfather was a born leader

My grandfather's life is quite a story. Samuel Eli Katz, the middle son in a family of seven, left his small Polish village, Ilza (Drilj), for Canada in 1913 along with his 13-year-old brother, Harry.

Sam was a penniless 20 year old when he arrived in Hamilton, but died at age 85 a man of riches. These riches were his spouse of 59 years, seven children, numerous grandchildren and great-grandchildren, his extended family, his synagogue, his family business, his passion for his community and his love of horse racing. In my eyes, this was a legacy hard to match.

Sam was a dichotomy – a delicious mixture of modern and traditional. He was a man of vision, whose first business was peddling fruit from a horse and wagon. Then he created an auto parts and accessories business in 1924 when the automobile was becoming a popular commodity. At the time, he marvelled at the tattered condition of his customer's shoes (they chose to repair their cars above their shoes).

Here was a man who curiously spent every Sabbath morning in prayer and every Sabbath afternoon at the racetrack. A man who built a family landmark operation without the ability to read any English, except for the racing form. A man who came home dirty and greasy six days a week after bidding for and dealing with used car parts and who, as a member of a religious ritual group, volunteered to help prepare the dead for burial. This was one of the many mitzvahs recognized within his community.

He was a born leader, a man of great distinction, conviction, perseverance, and pragmatism balanced by his sensitivity, humility, wit, wisdom and strong intuition. It is no wonder that he was nicknamed the Chief.

He was the first man that I ever saw cry openly, swear and kibitz with his workers, sing loudly off key and out of sync while leading prayers in his community, laugh with his great-grandchildren and tend to the sick and dying. His affection for his family was quiet and unassuming. I admired his benevolence, devotion to family values, generosity of spirit and dedication to his beliefs.

My grandfather adhered to other practices that circumscribed his way of life. He ate to live but also loved to eat and drink his daily schnapps, usually leaving a little to rub on his hair and face. I still remember his laughter, from my youth, whenever he applied the last few drops to me, my brother, sister or cousins.

I remember the glistening Brylcreem on his thinning hair, that subtle fragrance from his cologne, his pride in his immaculate appearance.

His zest and energy were evident from a glance or by his commanding voice, never really soft but always kind.

He didn't preach his ideas, he taught by his actions. Even as his immediate family grew to more than 40 people, he cherished family dinners, everybody together at each traditional holiday. The solution to the inevitable overflow was simply to eat in shifts.

He introduced us to friends and associates in investment terminology. With a twinkle in his eye, he would boast in his imperfect English, "these are mine-a-interest." Translated this meant that we were his true good fortune.

Shirley and grandfather Haskiel Grynszpan in Poland circa 1928.

His highly competitive business was open seven days a week, yet he made time not only for his charity work but also for other activities.

Happy Chanukah

'Well ahead of his time'

Being the eldest granddaughter, I was afforded great latitude. As a young girl, I enjoyed tagging along with the Chief to the "men only" section in the synagogue discovering the snuffboxes tucked away in a drawer in the sanctuary or sharing in the ceremonial breakfast of herring and schnapps with the cronies. I traipsed through car wrecking yards and felt privileged when sitting with him at wrestling matches, sometimes at ringside.

He was the first to introduce me to the idea of travelling to exotic places because of his verve and sense of adventure.

My grandfather was well ahead of his time. Long before the feminist movement, he attributed his business success to my grandmother's astuteness. His auto parts business was launched with the pennies that she secretly and relentlessly accumulated from redeemable bottles.

My grandmother's determination was a trait that permitted her to enjoy a long and enriched family life. Despite the removal of a kidney and then a stroke that permanently paralysed her left side at midlife, she continued to lead a normal life and predeceased her husband by only a few years. Her matriarchal position was never diluted but in fact strengthened.

The person that I missed most at the picnic was my dad, Nate. He would have delighted in cheering the underdog at the games, making us laugh with his jokes, "high-fiving" the little children or just putting his hand on our backs.

Even before my grandfather passed away, my dad became the head of the family business. My grandfather never retired nor always agreed with my father's decisions, but he handed over the reins anyway.

My dad held his parents in high regard and although he played hooky from school for weeks as a teenager, he always spoke to and about his parents with the greatest esteem.

He inherited much of his goodness from his parents. His philosophy was not dissimilar to his father's, but dad reared his children differently, not by rules and punishment but by respect, trust and freedom of choice. Making mistakes was part of our learning and being free to explore was encouraged.

My father was endowed with another rare attribute – he viewed life as a gift. Maybe that came from the fact that he was born at home two months premature and lived a healthy, full and long life. Unlike my grandfather, dad was soft-spoken but clearly expressive.

He could tell jokes with the comedic timing of George Burns. My mother always needed one of us to translate the X-rated ones. He was a man of few words but many emotions, and like his father was able to reveal his "feminine side," without apologies or shame.

Sam, Mary, Nate, Rose and Sadie (seated) circa 1919.

'I wish there were more like him'

He loved his work – a seven-day commitment for almost 60 years in the same family business. He retired after the business was sold, undertaking about six volunteer and charitable jobs with time left for playing cards almost every afternoon, reading voraciously and peeling apples for mom's award-winning pies. He was the first and the oldest person to volunteer for a new program to teach English with me in Israel one summer.

He was silently spiritual, never complained about his ill health and always expressed appreciation for what he received by assisting others. He never lost his ability to be a human calculator, finish a crossword puzzle or provide bookkeeping for my brother's law office. I still wonder why he dropped out of high school.

My dad trained hundreds of employees and apprentices in his business in a patient and non-confrontational manner. Many left to become competitors in their own businesses. When I was 16 I learned to drive, not in our family car, but in a pickup truck. That was his way of teaching, by example, and conveying the message that conventional solutions or choices are not necessarily the best or only way. My interpretation is that he had confidence in me as an individual and that even though I was a petite young woman who could barely reach the clutch, I could be trusted to handle a large, macho vehicle.

Like my grandfather, he had an aura of intimidating but gentle power. However, unlike my grandfather he never gave advice unless asked and never lectured me nor said, "I told you so."

If discipline was required, a look with his eyes would suffice. He would tell my mother to leave us alone when she got on our case and always preferred to avoid conflict, even with her. He was a mediator, a lover of life and a peacekeeper. How often he remarked, "Don't worry, it will all come out in the wash."

I wish that there were more people in this world like him.

Family meant everything to him. He would have loved the picnic, especially the paper-plate race for grandmothers and grandchildren. There I was at the starting line paired with Talia, my 3½-year-old granddaughter, coaching her on how to place the plates for me to step on, when I looked down the row to see that I was competing against my own mother.

For the record, she was the eldest at the picnic, an octogenarian who refuses to disclose, look or act her age (she doesn't count her blessings). Guess who won the race? Dad was probably cheering her on.

Photographs from the picnic were eventually distributed to each family to solidify the memories and to remind us that the next reunion, hopefully, is just around the corner.

Beverley Abramson is a Toronto-based photographer. Her documentary work is exhibited locally.

Modern-day Modi'in – "revolutionary" concept

By RUTH HEIGES
WZPS

The traditional ancient home of the Maccabees now has new "keepers of the flame."

These days, when the Maccabi World Union lights its Chanukah torch at the site where the ancient priestly family is purported to have been buried, the relay runners have an easy jog down the road to the burgeoning new town of Modi'in.

Nestled in the Judean foothills between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, Modi'in is destined to become Israel's fourth largest city.

Since the arrival of its first residents in July 1996, the population has grown to 32,000. Based on the pace of construction and planning, it is expected to increase at a rate of 10,000 residents a year to 120,000 in the foreseeable and planned future. The ultimate potential of the chartered urban area is 250,000.

In fact, other communities growing in the immediate vicinity, such as the village communities of Maccabim and Re'ut, the haredi Kiryat Sefer, moshavim, and the planned Orthodox community of Ohr Somayach, add considerably to the numbers and potential.

"When we first visited Modi'in, I was enthralled just by the drive through the tree-covered hills of the JNF forests," says Lisa Boxenbaum, who made aliyah at the age of eight.

"It reminded me of driving through my native Pennsylvania, and I was taken with the prospect of having my eyes bathed by this greenery every day.

"In fact, despite all of the construction completed to date, the proportion of parks and gardens and the overall attention to landscaping is one of the most striking features. A total of 155 acres (out of 11,500 for the complete city) have been set aside for parks and gardens, and many of these were developed in advance of even the first buildings."

This is a manifestation of the plan drawn up by world-renowned architect Moshe Safdie, who was commissioned by the Israel Ministry of Construction and Housing to develop the master plan in 1989. He developed a holistic concept, including urban control documents to regulate land use, density, height, setbacks, architectural character and appearance, as well as detailed town planning for two residential areas and supervision of design control for an additional seven areas.

Safdie's planning emphasizes communal life as an ideological goal, expressed by placing schools and other civic complexes in central valleys, allowing residential quarters to overlook them from the hillsides. All infrastructure is underground (electricity, telephone lines, gas lines, cables for television), thus preserving esthetics. If this continues to be sustained, the town promises to have a village character, no matter how large it becomes.

All of this only adds to the reasons why many young families choose to live in Modi'in. For one thing, the location is excellent for two-career families, with commuting times, under ideal circumstances, 25 minutes to Jerusalem and 30 minutes to Tel Aviv.

Moving there at the development stage and enduring the growing pains was also deemed a worthwhile investment by these young families. For the price of a one-bedroom apartment in Tel Aviv, it was possible to buy a four-bedroom apartment under construction and have a small private garden in Modi'in!

While it may be a most civilized form of pioneering, the endeavour is not without its drawbacks in the short term. A serious one is the fact that the town is currently almost exclusively a bedroom community, offering few employment opportunities except within the local services. This will start being remedied in the next few years, however, according to Ziva Swiatlowski, who served as the appointed city clerk for several years and continues to be employed by the local council.

"At the end of Sukkot, the Minister of Finance Avraham [Baiga] Shochat, laid the cornerstone for a high-tech industrial park in Modi'in which will eventually be one of the largest in the country. In accordance with the master plan, it is located near the Ben Shemen Forest, so it will also be possibly the greenest such centre in the country. We're extremely excited about the planning for it, since it will include day-care facilities for employees, a shopping centre, and even hotels, since it is so close to Ben-Gurion Airport."

Swiatlowski adds that a service park, featuring such businesses as auto-repair shops, is due to be built closer to the town centre. Between this and the high-tech park, 30,000 jobs will ultimately be created right in Modi'in.

Other key construction projects over the next few years include the city centre project. This will include pedestrian shopping arcades, roofed for protection from sun and rain; a city hall building; a college, a civic centre; and a central library. Infrastructure has almost been completed for a transportation centre, including a rail station and central bus station.

In the spirit of the Maccabees, perhaps, it might even be said that the entire concept of Modi'in is revolutionary. Yet, even as it grows, the fundamental nature of the region will be preserved, with its lush forests and distinctive sites, which include the Ben Shemen Forest, the first planted by the Jewish National Fund, the Neot Kedumim biblical village, the Hasmonean Village (each with activities for families), and the traditional site of the graves of the Maccabees.

How Jewish cemetery in Venice was saved

By ELIZABETH CHAPMAN
Special to The CJN

Abandoned for two centuries and almost completely inaccessible to visitors for decades, the once deteriorating Ancient Jewish Cemetery of Venice has been fully restored, and guided tours of this unique site are being offered for the first time.

The Cemetery – located on the Lido, a chain of sandy islands between the Lagoon of Venice and the Adriatic sea – is considered a treasure of European Jewish heritage. It is remarkable for the uniquely personal perspective it gives on the history of the Jewish community in Europe and the lives of the individuals who have inhabited Venice's Jewish ghetto for more than five centuries.

While a Jewish population may have lived in the region that was to become Venice in the first century, the Ancient Cemetery represents the first documented Jewish presence in Venice. It is also one of the oldest Jewish cemeteries in Europe.

The Cemetery was established in 1386 when the Venetian Republic ceded the vineyard of a Benedictine monastery to the Jewish community as a burial site. Earlier that year, the Venetians had formally invited Jewish families to establish a community in their city, hoping Jewish lending activities could rebuild the city's failing financial system ravaged by long wars with Genoa. The new residents requested a cemetery.

The Cemetery was used until the second half of the 18th century. It is not certain why the site on the Lido was chosen, but the island's isolation in a time before the invention of the vaporetto was probably a deciding factor.

Many of the earliest burials were disturbed by those hostile to the Jewish community, and in 1389 a wooden fence was built to protect the Cemetery grounds and prevent desecration of graves. The Cemetery's oldest surviving gravestone dates back to that year, when it was unveiled for a young Ashkenazi Jew named Shmuel ben Shimshon. Of all the Jewish cemeteries in Europe, only the cemetery in Worms, Germany, has tombstones more ancient. A few grave markers have also survived from the 1400s, a time when the Jewish community in Venice was limited to Ashkenazi Jews.

The Venetians regarded the Jewish community with ambivalence, at various times expelling and reinviting them to live within the city, permitting their religious practices, but only if they were willing to live within the bounds and laws decreed by city ordinances. In 1516, the Jewish quarter was formally established by the Venetian government in a poor neighbourhood near a foundry on the Italian island Ghetto. (The word "ghetto" derives from this early Jewish neighbourhood.) The ghetto eventually became home not only to Ashkenazi, but also to Levantine, Spanish, and Portuguese Jews.

The Cemetery's grave markers and monuments reflect the changing Jewish population in Venice as it was altered by waves of Jewish migration throughout Europe. Early gravestones are modest, strictly avoiding decoration and featuring simple Hebrew inscriptions. Later graves feature false sarcophagi, large burial markers, and monumental family tombs that reflect more lavish Venetian taste. At the same time, the rich array of styles and inscriptions on the tombstones

Prominent and anonymous are buried in cemetery reveals not only a growing ethnic mix, but the increasing financial success of the Jewish business community and changing fashions through the centuries.

By the 17th century, the Jewish community was at its height, with a population estimated to have numbered roughly 5,000. The growth of the community, along with the devastation of plagues that struck in 1576 and 1630, triggered enlargements of the Cemetery.

In keeping with Italian customs of the time, the 17th-century Jewish funerary monuments often used family crests and geographical references, as well as epigraphs written in Hebrew. The tombs are decorated with elaborately carved trees and vessels, winged angels, biblical scenes, the sun and stars, ladders and towers, and animal figures. Eighteenth-century late-Baroque sarcophagi feature lavish sheaves of acanthus leaves, pomegranate trees, and bunches of grapes.

Many of the Jews expelled from Spain and Portugal in the late 15th century retained their Iberian coats of arms and marked their tombs with the Lion of Castille, castles, or suits of armour. Upraised hands mark the graves of the Coens (Cohens), or kohanim, who are regarded as the descendants of temple priests in biblical times. The graves of the Levites are marked by a pitcher, often shown pouring water into a basin, in reference to their ancestral duties washing the hands of the Jewish priests. The Star of David and the crests of Sephardi and Ashkenazi communities can be seen on stones throughout the Cemetery.

Both the prominent and the anonymous are buried in the Ancient Jewish Cemetery. A border marker dated and inscribed "1631 Hebrei" may have indicated a mass grave of those who died in a plague of that year. Many other tombstones are the only witness to the lives of the individuals they commemorate.

One of the most prominent figures buried in the Cemetery is Rabbi Leon da Modena (1571-1648), an eclectic thinker and extraordinary orator who was the author of The History of Jewish Rituals. It was said that his lectures were so compelling that even Catholic cardinals and foreign royalty would visit the ghetto to hear him speak.

Not far from Modena's tomb are the graves of the philologist and grammarian Elia Levita (1469-1549) and the poet Sara Copio Sullam (late 1500s-1641), who hosted a famous literary salon in the 17th century – the period of the ghetto's greatest splendour. Her tombstone bears the Copio family crest, a scorpion, as well as her husband's family crest, a ladder.

Other tombs include that of Simone Luzzatto, a gifted rabbi and eventual successor of Rabbi Modena, and Daniel Rodriguez, head of the Occidental Jews.

Because of the Lido's location at the entrance of the Venetian port, the island became a strategic site for the defence of the city. Burials had to be suspended from 1671 to 1675 when the northern part of the Cemetery was fortified during the war with the Turks. Napoleon's troops are said to have used tombstones as cannon platforms after his 1796 victory over the Venetian Republic, and by the mid-1800s the Austrian army occupied a part of the Cemetery grounds which were cleared and used as a target-shooting range. In 1774, a new cemetery – in use to the present day – was established and the Ancient Cemetery closed.

Yet even in destitution, the Ancient Cemetery drew attention and prominent visitors. Goethe described seeing its tombstones buried under windblown sand, the Romantic poets Byron and Shelley rode horseback along the beach by its wild and overgrown grounds, George Sand and the poet Alfred de Musset had a tempestuous fight among its gravestones and Henry James wandered amid its monuments during a sojourn in Venice.

Eventually, uncontrolled growth of vegetation began to seriously damage tombstones, while incursion of the water table drowned part of the cemetery in a swamp that swallowed burial markers. Unlike their famous predecessors, modern-day visitors found themselves confronted with a locked gate and glimpses of fallen tombstones among a jungle of brush or brackish water. The only way to save the Cemetery was to mount a massive effort to drain, stabilize and restore the entire 32,000-square-foot site.

In 1996, Cesare Vivante, leader of the UNESCO committee for the historic Jewish centre, brought the plight of the Ancient Cemetery to the attention of Save Venice and The Steven H. And Alida Brill Scheuer Foundation. Significant pledges from Save Venice and the Foundation, as well as from the Veneto Region and the city and other donors allowed the restoration to begin in earnest in 1998; it was completed in October 1999.

The extensive restoration included rebuilding the Cemetery's protective walls, clearing the tangle of scrub and fallen trees, draining the swamp, as well as recovering and repairing the fallen gravestones. Great care was taken to maintain the quiet, wooded beauty of the site and to respect its sacred character, while restoring the Cemetery and preserving its striking monuments.

More than 100 lost tombstones were recovered in the process of mapping and draining the site. Among the most surprising discoveries were the unusual 17th-century burial markers of the Cividal family. All 14 of these monuments are shaped in the form of columns topped with Doric capitals and feature personal epigraphs as well as the family crest, which depicts Samson fighting a lion.

The success of the complex restoration project led the Jewish Committee of Venice to establish a commission that is considering various initiatives to restore other important Jewish historical monuments in Venice.

The Brill Scheuer Foundation is currently supporting the restoration of the Scuola Grande Tedesca, or German Synagogue, the oldest in the ghetto. The Scuola Tedesca was originally completed in 1529 and was reconstructed in 1733. It features 16th-century ceiling frescoes and a striking woman's gallery that was added in the 18th century. Work on the project is due to be completed in late 2000 or early 2001.
